

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

SEE OF SODOR AND MAN.

ADDRESS FOR A RETURN.

THE EARL OF POWIS moved an Address for a Return of the various sources from which the income of the see of Sodor and Man was derived, and its amount; and asked, What course Her Majesty's Government were taking with reference to legislation on the subject by the Island Legislature, and if they would present any Papers on the subject? According to the Returns of the Ecclesiastical Revenues Commission, 1835, the income of the See to which his Motion referred to amounted to £2,000 a-year. That income, he believed, was made up partly of tithes and partly from lands which had been alienated from various parishes in the island; but the amount of the sums derived from these sources were not enumerated in the Return, and he thought additional and more detailed information was required. The alienation of tithes in the middle ages had been a fertile source of abuse; and if these tithes were not required for the endowment of the See, they should be restored to the parishes in which they arose.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Return of the various sources from which the income of the See of Sodor and Man is derived, and its amount.—(The Earl of Powis.)

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, he was sorry he could not answer the Question which the noble Earl had put, as to the course which the Government intended to take in reference to legislation on the subject by the Island Legislature. The matter was under the consideration of the Secretary of State; but he was not prepared to indicate the decision at which the right hon. Gentleman was likely to arrive. As to the Return which had been asked for, he was quite willing that it should be furnished; and, in addition to that, he would be quite prepared to lay upon the Table, if it were moved for, a letter on the subject which had been received from the Lieutenant Governor of the Island.

Motion agreed to.

BURIALS BILL.—RESOLUTION.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN gave Notice, that on Tuesday, the 17th July, in the event of the Burial Acts Consolidation Bill being withdrawn before that time, he should move the following Resolution:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when the long-pending controversy as to interments in parish churchyards ought to be closed, by permitting such interments to take place without the burial service of the Church of England, and with such other Christian and orderly religious services as the friends or relatives of the deceased may think fit."

QUESTION.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR—THE SUEZ CANAL.—QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true, as stated in the "Daily News" in a telegram dated June 16th, that the Porte has refused the request of Mr. Layard to permit the "neutralization" of the Suez Canal?

MR. BOURKE: In reply to the Question of the hon. Member, I have to state it is not true, as stated in The Daily News, that the Porte has refused, at the request of Mr. Layard, to permit the neutralization of the Suez Canal, and for this reason—that no request of that kind was made by Mr. Layard, and therefore no refusal to his request could have been given. The only intimation which Mr. Layard has been instructed to make upon the subject is contained in the Papers which are now before Parliament, and no answer has yet been given by the Porte to the communication that Mr. Layard was desired to make.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PRISONS BILL.—[BILL 121.]

(Mr. Assheton Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbotson.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Assheton Cross.)

MR. RYLANDS moved that the Bill be read a third time that day three months. He said he should not, under ordinary circumstances, have taken this course; but he thought there were several weighty reasons of expediency which would justify him in asking the House, even at the last moment, to reject the Bill. In the first place, it proposed a scheme that next year would necessarily entail a large addition to the expenditure of the country; and, looking at the depressed condition of trade, and knowing that the revenue would inevitably undergo a consequent decline, while he saw no indication of any strong desire on the part of the Government to keep down expenditure, he felt bound to contemplate the probability of increase of taxation being voted to meet the increased charges. He thought it most objectionable for the Government to ask the House to increase the public burdens next year without, at the same time, putting before them an estimate of the Ways and Means by which that increase was to be met. Another ground on which he thought it inexpedient to pass this Bill at the present moment was, that there was a probability of a measure being passed before very long which would so change the character of our summary jurisdiction system as to lead to a great reduction in the number of prisoners committed by the justices of the peace. Notwithstanding this, the Prisons Bill proceeded entirely on the lines of the present demand for prison accommodation. Again, there was the prospect that, in a short time, the public scandal which now attended the detention of prisoners awaiting their trial would be abated; and to the extent to which the number of persons so detained was diminished, there would be a diminution in the number of prisoners in English gaols at any given time. He thought also the House should hesitate before it handed over to the Government every prison in the country — at all events, until it was assured that the prisons at present in the hands of the Government were well managed. There was a great question, indeed, whether the management of the convict prisons was such as to justify their handing over to the Government every gaol in the country. The Government had promised an inquiry into the subject of prison discipline, and it was impossible to say at present what the outcome of that inquiry would be. He wished to take the opportunity of stating that the course which the Government had adopted of referring great questions of administration to Departmental Committees was a most objectionable course, for persons placed on such Committees were not the parties who had an interest in promoting administrative reform; but the fact that great doubts existed as to the management of convict establishments was a matter which ought to make Parliament hesitate before proceeding further in that direction. There was an important association called the Howard Society containing a number of hon. Gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House, distinguished for the ability, benevolence, and earnestness they displayed in the direction of improving our prison discipline, and they had come to the conclusion that the Government prisons were not conducted in such a manner as to promote the moral elevation of offenders. And he knew that the members of that association were beginning to doubt whether it would be a wise thing to pass this Bill. He was not one of those who would turn our prisons into drawing rooms, but he did hold that punishment awarded to prisoners should be administered with a view to raise rather than to degrade the character of the offender, and he believed that the Government had altogether failed in achieving this great object by their convict system. He, therefore, thought it would be a great misfortune if, by the passage of such a Bill, Parliament should take from the local jurisdiction of the magistrates all those prisons which at present might be made the vehicles of elevating the character of those who were confined therein, and hand them over to the cast-iron system applied by the Government to the gaols under their control. But there was another important consideration. The Home Secretary had promised to deal with the treatment of unconvicted prisoners; and everyone admitted that the treatment to which they had long been subjected was a scandal which ought to be removed; and he submitted that the House of Commons ought to have the absolute control over any rules which might be provided by the Home Secretary for that purpose, and that a Schedule of the proposed rules should have been prepared for the consideration of the House. The conclusion to which he had come on the question of expediency was this—that the Bill ought to stand over till next Session, even if any intention existed of proceeding with it. The long discussions which had taken place had not removed a single objection against the Bill, and many of the arguments which had been adduced in favour of the Bill had been proved to be, to a great extent, delusions. He believed that an increasing dislike had been gradually growing up against the Bill amongst hon. Gentlemen opposite, and that if it should be rejected very little disappointment would be felt anywhere except amongst the officials in the Home Office. For his own part, he was not one who did not appreciate the advantage of having a House of Lords; and as this Bill fulfilled all the conditions requiring the exercise of their veto—inasmuch as it was a partial, crude, ill-digested, precipitate, and by no means a pressing measure—he hoped the Upper House would exercise its constitutional function and throw it out. Not one of the objections originally raised to the Bill had been removed in the course of the discussion. The vicious principle of centralization remained. The right hon. Gentleman had tried to salve over the wounded dignity of the local magistrates; but the effect of the Bill would practically be to disestablish the visiting justices. If these gentlemen attempted to assert themselves, they would be met by some Government official full of superciliousness and red tape, who would take care to let them know that he, in his official capacity, represented the concentrated wisdom and intelligence of the nation. The result would be that high-minded men would not accept the position of visiting justices. They would not submit to the indignity of playing second fiddle to a gentleman from the Home Office; and if the office of visiting justice continued to exist at all, it would be filled by men of an inferior stamp. It had been said that the magistrates were in no sense representatives of the ratepayers, and this was true to a certain extent; but it should not be forgotten that there was a strong tendency in favour of placing the management of county affairs in the hands of County Boards, on which the magistrates should have their due share of representation; and it should be borne in mind that if legislation proceeded upon the lines of the Prisons Bill there would soon be nothing left for County Boards to do, and the arguments in favour of their establishment would cease to exist. Another objection to the Bill was, that it proposed to add 2,500 to the already large army of Government officials, who were always making demands upon the public purse, and whose influence in various ways upon Members of that House, and on the public through the Press, to which many of them had unlimited access, was already sufficiently strong, and had doubtless had its weight in the action taken by the country against the late Government, whose Leader was disliked by these servants of the Crown, in consequence of his expressed opposition to extravagance in the different Departments of the State. Besides that objection, the measure would tend to a great increase of the superannuation establishment. He also objected to the measure on the ground that the Government appointments would not be equal in character to the appointments made by the local authorities, and would probably be determined by political influence rather than by considerations of fitness and efficiency. The main arguments urged in favour of the measure had been proved to have been based upon insufficient grounds, and had been shown to be delusive. The Home Secretary himself must have been led to doubt the correctness of some of the reasons which he urged to justify the introduction of the measure. The great plea brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman in favour of the Bill was economy. How did the case stand in that respect? He had calculated that £50,000 a-year would be saved by the abolition of small prisons and by diminished cost under Government management. But in Committee the Home Secretary said there were "prisons and prisons," and he spoke of maintaining a certain number of small gaols for the detention of prisoners waiting for trial. The Home Secretary saw the injustice of sending unconvicted prisoners, perhaps 50 miles away, from their legal advisers and friends; but he urged that these gaols for detention of prisoners could be conducted at a very low expense, as there need be no arrangements for hard labour or other punitive discipline. Still, it would be impossible to keep up prisons of that kind without a certain number of officials and other expenses. But what about prisoners convicted, and sentenced to short terms of imprisonment with hard labour for 7, 14, or 21 days? Were they to be sent away, perhaps to a distance of 50 miles, when there was a prison maintained at their very doors? But even granting that the Home Secretary would be able to concentrate the prisoners throughout the country in 50 or 60 gaols, which was very doubtful, the idea that there would be any economy in Government management was entirely contrary to experience. The present cost per head per annum of prisoners in convict establishments was £35, and the average cost in local gaols, with all the disadvantages of many small prisons, was about the same sum. But let them contrast a large gaol under local management with the cost of Government prisons. Take Salford, for instance. In the year ending September 29, 1876, the cost was only £15 12s. 5d. per head, or absolutely £20 per head below the average cost of Government prisons. The average cost for officers' salaries alone in the convict establishments amounted to £16 7s. 6d. for each prisoner, or more than the total cost of Salford gaol for all purposes, and the superannuation charges for retired officers of convict prisons—a large item—was not included in that account. It would be urged that Salford was an exceptional case; but the average cost of all the Lancashire gaols was about £17 per head, and these instances, at all events, proved what local management could accomplish. Other counties might, under proper management, and with facilities for closing unnecessary gaols, effect great economies, and in various parts of the country there were movements in that direction. County Boards, elected by the ratepayers, would naturally be alive to considerations of economy, and, if established for the management of gaols and other county purposes, would give every prospect of a general improvement. But there could be no expectation of such improvement from Government control. They would level up instead of levelling down; and in place of reducing the cost of other gaols to the Lancashire standard of £16 or £18, the Government officials would probably raise the cost of Lancashire gaols to their own standard of £30 or £35 per prisoner. He warned the House that instead of the 18,000 prisoners now in local gaols costing £50,000 less per year, they would be more likely to cost the country £100,000 more—and there would also be a large and increasing additional expenditure upon prison buildings, which would be charged to the National Exchequer. Another argument urged by the Home Secretary was his expectation that £50,000 a-year would be obtained by the more profitable employment of prison labour, and in support of his views he made use of a most fallacious illustration drawn from the experience of the convict establishments. Because in local gaols the average earnings of prisoners were much lower than in the case of the inmates of the convict prison at Pentonville, he argued that he could bring the earnings of prisoners throughout the country up to the Pentonville standard of £9 per annum. His exact words were—

“We have no reason to doubt that if all these prisoners were under the same discipline, and properly grouped together, the amount of money they earn would not be as large as is now earned in the best managed convict prisons, and we believe it would go on continuously increasing.”

But the manifest fallacy which lay at the root of this argument was that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cross) overlooked the great difference between prisoners sentenced for long and for short terms. In convict prisons the whole of the prisoners were under long sentences, and their labour could be turned to account; but in local gaols the large majority of the inmates were confined for very short periods, and no amount of “grouping” or “classification” could get anything out of them. The Home Secretary had apparently overlooked in his calculation the material fact that out of the 18,000 prisoners in local gaols there were about five-sixths who were committed for short sentences, from seven days to two months—the largest proportions being for the shortest terms. The great argument for the Bill was, that it would relieve local taxation. The farmers, who were not distinguished for political knowledge, were induced throughout the country to support the Bill by that plea; but the Returns just laid on the Table on County Rates and Expenditure showed that all relief of local taxation by subventions was secured by the addition of a much larger burden on the Imperial taxation, so that there really was no saving. On the ground of local administration, of economy, and in the interests of the prisoner himself, this was an objectionable Bill; and if it were to be sent to the House of Lords he hoped it would go with such a strong protest against it that that House would exercise its constitutional privilege, and reject the Bill.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR, in seconding the Amendment, again raised his voice against the punishment of flogging, which had been abolished by all other civilized nations, but which was now to take a new lease in this country. It was a brutal and a brutalizing punishment, and it was impossible to deter men from crime by treating them as brutes. All the delegates at the Prison Conference repudiated it. It distinctly tended to increase the brutality which it was intended to stamp out. It was not only persons abroad who took that view, but all our Governors of gaols also adopted it, notably Mr. Frederick Hill and Mr. Shepherd. The excuse given for the use of the lash was the phrase that "discipline must be preserved;" the same excuse that the Dey of Algiers gave for retaining the punishments of impaling and burning. He denounced flogging as a punishment for which reason, justice, and Christianity had nothing to say. It had been avoided in the convict ships. There had been a panic with regard to garotting, and in 1863 an Act allowed flogging for the offence; but the offence had ceased before the Act. Robberies with violence, however, which were also floggable under the Act, increased in number, and crimes not floggable decreased. In the 10 years previous to 1863 there were 3,261 floggable cases, and in the 10 years after 3,380. Although in those 10 years the total number of offences against property with violence—but short of violence which could be punished by the cat—had decreased 762. The attempt to stamp out violence by corporal punishment was a miserable piece of legislative quackery. People had as yet had no opportunity of expressing an opinion on the Bill, but at the next Election they would have the power. He implored the right hon. Gentleman to make a system for the communication of prisoners with the outside world. He had seen the prisoner whose letter he had read to the House the other evening, and had asked him why he did not communicate with the Governor or the visiting justices. The man said—"No visiting justice ever spoke to me, or asked me how I was treated." He concluded by thanking those Irish Members who had exerted themselves to amend the Bill in that respect.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Rylands.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, that, though few subjects came amiss to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), he had, apparently, not studied military strategy. If he had done so, he would have been aware that defeated Generals usually changed their tactics; and it would be better for the hon. Member, now that his views had been completely stated, not to insist on a division. With regard to the punishment of flogging, though he would be as glad as the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Taylor) if it could be abolished, he could not agree with him as to the absence of evidence for its efficacy. About 15 years ago there was a Frenchman in Petworth Gaol, who having deserted his regiment in France escaped to England, and was under sentence for a serious burglary. Although he was well treated and cared for, he commenced a series of the worst kind of conduct, and after doing everything he could to upset the discipline of the gaol he attempted to murder one of the warders. He was not flogged, but put into a dark cell, after which he again a second time attempted to take a warder's life. That man was brought before him and another magistrate, and they sentenced him to 25 lashes. He sprang at them and endeavoured to push them down, but was then told that when he recovered from his first punishment he should have 25 lashes more. The man was flogged; he might have been heard crying out at a considerable distance, for he was a coward; he need not say he was not flogged a second time, but he behaved afterwards as well as any man in Petworth Gaol; he learnt a trade and went out, to all appearances, a reformed man. Now, he would appeal to the hon. Member for Leicester, and ask him what he would do with a man who deliberately attempted every time he could to murder the warder in charge of him. Then with respect to the visiting justices. There must have been some misapprehension with respect to Holloway Gaol. At all events, if what had been alleged were true of it, it must be an exception. Speaking for himself, he declared that he always went alone into the cells of the prisoners when he was visiting. He heard any alleged complaints that might be made patiently, and if he thought there were any real grounds for them he did his best to provide a remedy. He protested against making use of an exceptional case to attempt to establish a wholesale charge against the justices. He frankly confessed that he objected to the Bill because it was based upon the principle of centralization; because it would confiscate county property; and because it would take existing power out of the hands of the county magistrates. Of course, if his right hon. Friend was to have the responsibility, he must have the authority now possessed by the magistrates; but he strongly objected to the responsibility being placed in his right hon. Friend's hands. His right hon. Friend had been tempted by the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) to place our county gaols under the same organization as the convict prisons. He hoped it would never enter into his right hon. Friend's thoughts to do any such thing, because he believed the system in the county gaols was at present better than that in the convict prisons. He again appealed to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Burnley not to divide the House.

MR. HIBBERT, though agreeing with the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) in his objection to the Bill, must join in the appeal that had been made to him by his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Sir Walter Barttelot) not to go to a division. He could not oppose the Bill on the ground taken by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Taylor). There were strong reasons why the punishment of flogging should be retained. As a visiting justice, he had to inflict that punishment on a man who had been placed in solitary confinement, put upon short diet, and punished in every other possible way for refusing to work. When brought before him, the man told him he had been in prison almost since he was a child—he had never worked, and never would work. The man got two dozen lashes, and did not take the punishment at all amiss, and the result was, that he took an interest in the man, and afterwards enabled him to go out to Canada. They must all give great credit to his right hon. Friend who had charge of the Bill for the patience and ability with which he had conducted it through the House. He was opposed to it, because he thought it very doubtful whether the change was a desirable one, and whether the prisons would be more economically managed by the State than they were by the counties. But he opposed it chiefly on the ground that it was unwise that these additional duties should be imposed on the Secretary of State and his Department. His right hon. Friend brought forward the Bill in the interests of uniformity of management, discipline, and punishment; and also, in the interest of economy. But while the cost in the convict prisons was £35 per head per annum, the cost in the county and borough prisons was only £28; and there was no ground for believing that the prisons, when transferred, would drop to that. At Pentonville the cost was £23, after deducting the value of their work. When the State paid the whole of the expense there would not be the same motive for economy as existed at present. He represented the almost unanimous opinion—in the proportion of 98 to 2—of the Lancashire magistrates, who were opposed to the Bill. With regard to uniformity of management, discipline, and punishment, that great good might be got by this Bill he was willing to admit; but there was no reason why they should disestablish all the county and borough prisons in the country merely because there existed a number of small and worthless prisons which did not deserve to be maintained. The Home Secretary ought rather to have taken powers to close those small prisons, and also to advise the counties in regard to erecting and establishing prisons under a proper system. By that means he might have kept the local management of the justices and also secured the interests of economy. In the county and borough prisons the justices had introduced various trades and obtained a large amount of prison earnings, while maintaining the prisoners at the lowest cost—matters in respect to which those gaols contrasted very favourably with the convict prisons managed by the State. Again, he objected to the proposed transfer, because it would impose a large amount of additional trouble on an already overworked Department. If the Bill passed, in England there would be 305 chief officers and 1,519 subordinate officers to be appointed, leaving out of the question the small prisons—some 50 or 60 in number; and in Scotland 77 chief and 176 subordinate officers—at least 2,000 additional officers. In the course of a few years the number of those appointments would, in all probability, considerably increase. He did not believe the Bill would effect a saving. On the contrary, he thought it would result in additional expense to the country. There was in Gloucestershire only one prison, and the magistrates would really be punished for reducing crime in their county. Mr. Baker had written a letter to say that he would rather see an empty gaol than a well-regulated one. Again, he thought that the expected total saving of £100,000 through the closing of small prisons and from prison labour could hardly be depended on; and he urged that the successful efforts which had been made by justices to reduce crime were ignored by the proposal to transfer the management of the county and borough prisons to the State. Dr. Wise, the leader of the prison reformation movement in America, had borne strong testimony in favour of the existing system in this country; but he (Mr. Hibbert) hardly thought Dr. Wise would speak so strongly with respect to our convict prisons, and would be surprised to hear that it was now proposed to transfer the borough and county gaols to the State. In conclusion, he warned the Government that it was embarking in a doubtful and hazardous experiment in taking away those prisons from the management of the local authorities. The reports of the visitors of convict prisons led him to believe that the duties of the visiting justices would not be very pleasant.

MR. NEWDEGATE said: Mr. Speaker, I was prevented, towards the close of the Consideration of this Bill on the Report, from being present in the House when the Amendment of which I had given Notice was, through the kindness of the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon), submitted to the House. That Amendment did not meet the question completely. The terms of it ought to have required the Home Secretary not only to submit for the approval of this House the Rules and Regulation for prison discipline—which he will under this Bill be entitled to frame—but it ought also to have comprehended the “Orders” which this Bill entitles him to make. The difference between the Orders and the Rules, according to the Bill, is technically this—the Bill enables the right hon. Gentleman at once to take possession of every county and borough gaol in England and Wales; to displace the county magistrates from the possession of the county gaols, and the Councils and borough authorities from the possession of the borough gaols; and, by Order, he will be able to discontinue any gaol he may choose, and, as the Bill stands, without giving any information to either House of Parliament with respect to his proceedings in this very important matter; and he will be able also to change the appropriation of those gaols, and to say which shall be relegated to long, and which to short, sentences. Hitherto, according to the Common Law of this country, every criminal, except those under sentence of transportation or penal servitude, which is its equivalent—in fact, a sentence of outlawry—has been, of right, confined within the jurisdiction where he committed his offence. That great principle of the Common Law is to be swept away by this Bill, and the right hon. Gentleman, by way of effecting, as he has said, economy, and by way also of perfecting, as he alleges, the system of prison discipline, proposes to place the county and borough gaols, as to their ownership, and in other respects, upon the system of the Government convict prisons. He would thus obtain power to designate which of the prisons shall be appropriated for long, and which for short sentences; the power also to remove every prisoner from the site of his conviction, and therefore from the proximity of those who might assist the prisoner in his defence before trial, and to prevent those who are best qualified to judge of the application of his punishment, after he has been convicted, from easily reaching him. Let the House make no mistake; it is by this Bill proposed to import into England the system of prison discipline against which, before the abolition of transportation, the Colonies rebelled. Colony after Colony declared the system of constant Government interference entailed by the existence of this system of prison discipline incompatible with free institutions, and that it interrupted their development. And this is the system which a Conservative Government—[Laughter]—yes, the Conservative Party—proposes to import into England and Wales. I know something of the origin of this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to me, when he introduced the Bill, to take a very shallow view of the whole subject. I did not at that time remember, but I have since then recollected, that although the right hon. Gentleman was a Member of this House from March, 1857, to March, 1862, he was not again a Member of this House till December, 1868. The right hon. Gentleman was therefore absent from this House when the debates took place upon the Bill introduced in 1862 by Mr. Pope Hennessy, entitled the Roman Catholic Prisoners Bill, and it is the principle of that Bill which you are now enacting. The right hon. Gentleman was not present in this House or a Member of it when that Bill was discussed; nor in 1863, when the Prison Ministers Act passed, the right hon. Gentleman was not a Member; nor was he present here as a Member when the Act of 1865—the Prisons Act—was passed. And this diminishes my surprise at hearing the right hon. Gentleman constantly referring to the Act of 1865, as if this Bill was carrying out its principles. Now, the truth is this—this Bill is to reverse the principle of the Act of 1865. The right hon. Gentleman has skilfully made great use in Committee, and before, of his retention of certain details of the Act of 1865, as though he intended to preserve the principle of that Act; he has been careful not to inform the House that he was about to reverse the principle. I will show the House how completely he proposes to reverse these principles. My hon. Friends on this side of the House are adopting a measure which they may please to call Conservative, but which I cannot otherwise consider than as re-actionary, and not Conservative. There has been a disposition among hon. Members here to be careless as to the scope and object of this Bill; they seem to consider it merely as a Party measure; they knew that it was introduced by a Home Secretary of a Conservative Administration, and they concluded it must be a Conservative

Bill. But I must be forgiven for endeavouring to show them that their notions of Conservatism must have been very much changed within the last few years, if they can consider this a Conservative measure. It is re-actionary, and re-actionary in the worst sense. It proposes to reverse the system established in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, by which the gaols were committed to the care and management of the visiting justices; while the right hon. Gentleman goes still further back historically in his re-action by abolishing the responsibility of the sheriffs for the custody of the prisoners generally, and in both cases he proposes to substitute the authority of himself, a political officer, for the authority hitherto exercised by judicial officers. In these respects, I would impress upon my hon. Friends that this measure is not conservative of the Common Law or of the Constitution of this country. Hon. Members have been beguiled as to the character of this Bill by the fact that the hon. Member who has proposed the rejection of this Bill is supposed to be a Radical, and that Members of the Radical Party oppose this Bill. I rejoice that the ultra-Liberal and the Radical Party are learning to act in a Conservative sense, when the so-called Conservative Party becomes, as in this case, re-actionary in its proposals. I can assure hon. Members opposite that they will gain credit in this country, and a just credit, for persevering in this course. They must see, from the feeble and spasmodic attempts that are made in France and elsewhere to imitate our Parliamentary system, while lacking the other securities for freedom which this country has hitherto possessed, how much this country has to lose in the traditional safeguards for its freedom, of which the greatest is its Common Law. What has been the course pursued by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary? He has, while the Bill has been in this House, been compelled to admit that the legislative powers, which he demands for himself by this Bill, are so enormous that he cannot expect this House to consent to grant them, unless he places upon the Table of the House some account of his exercise of these Legislative functions; but he has avoided including in the documents he has undertaken to lay upon the Table of this House for 40 days the

"Orders," which are to be his most important instruments. He has consented to lay upon the Table of this House for 40 days the Rules and Regulations which relate to matters of minor importance referring to the internal administration of the gaols; but even then, when asked to propose these Rules and Regulations to the House, as a Member of the Government having the enormous command over the time of this House which the House has unwisely conceded to the Government, he has refused; and, as the Bill stands, it will be the merest chance if any unofficial Member can acquire through the Ballot the opportunity of calling the attention of the House to these Rules and Regulations. I am, Sir, opposed to this Bill. So is my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot). He has expressed a hope that we who agree with him in opposition to this Bill will not divide against this Bill; though, as my hon. and gallant Friend added—"I am as much opposed to it as you are." I am perfectly aware that last Session many hon. Members on this side of the House who voted in favour of the second reading of this Bill now regret that they did so. But I also know how pachydermatous is Party organization. Then I may be asked—why speak, if you will not divide? I answer, that it is due to the Home Secretary that he should be made to feel beforehand the weight of the responsibility he is about to take on his shoulders. It is due to every Member on this side of the House that he should understand the position in which he is placing himself by repudiating for his brother magistrates and himself the performance of duties which have hitherto been held by his neighbours, I will not use the expression to "justify," but I will say to commend the retention of his property and position. And now I will, by permission of the House, shortly point out the great changes which this Bill is about to effect. Under the Act of 1865 it was the duty of the magistrates, as visiting justices, to provide and maintain prisons within their several counties, cities, boroughs, or other prison jurisdictions; and for this purpose to purchase land, direct repairs, additions, or alterations, and to enter into all necessary contracts for provisions and other requisites. To confer these powers upon, and to require the performance of these duties from the justices, was the first principle of the Act of 1865. These functions of the county and borough justices are abolished by this Bill in favour of the Home Secretary. The second principle of the Act of 1865 was that it should be the duty of the justices to appoint, dismiss, remove, or superannuate the governors, chaplains, surgeons, gaolers, prison instructors, and other officers; to grant leave of absence, and to appoint substitutes in the case of death, sudden illness, or other cause. The whole of that second principle of local self-government which is retained by the Act of 1865 will be swept away by this Bill. The third principle of the Act of 1865 is that it is incumbent upon the justices to make rules for the discipline of the prisons; for regulation of hard labour and of employment; for the dietary, bedding, and washing, and for granting special allowances to prisoners; for the classification of, or for the immediate removal of prisoners to other prisons on the occurrence of the breaking out of contagious or infectious diseases; to make rules for the reception of and for allowances to unconvicted prisoners; also for allowances for any discharged prisoner to Prisoners' Aid Societies, and for providing them with means to return to their respective places of settlement. That is the third principle which is to be abolished by this Bill. The fourth principle of the Act of 1865 rendered it incumbent on the justices to visit and inspect the prisons; to hear complaints; to examine into the conduct of the officers, or into the treatment and conduct of the prisoners; to regulate the means of setting them to work; to inquire into the amount of, and to regulate the disposal of the earnings of prisoners for their benefit; to control the expenditure incurred; to inquire into abuses; and to make rules for the alteration and regulation of all such matters. That is the fourth principle of local self-government which is abolished by this Bill, and when I say abolished, I mean abolished so far the depositary as these duties, for all these duties imposed on the visiting justices are by the Bill transferred to the Home Secretary and his new Commissioners. Hitherto the law has been that the justices should regulate the religious and secular instruction; the hours for religious services; the admission of ministers of various denominations; should guard against the introduction of improper persons; should regulate the visits of relations or other persons to prisoners before or after conviction; and make rules as to the use of books, printed papers, or written communications which might be required from time to time. That is the fifth principle of the Act which will be abolished by this Bill—I mean abolished so far as the depositary of the functions is to be changed, that they are to be taken from the visiting justices. The sixth principle set aside is that the reports of deaths and the records of the prison are no longer to be kept by the justices, but to be preserved by the new authority of the Secretary of State and his Commissioners. What, Sir, is to remain to the justices? Certain justices are to visit the prison and to hear complaints. We have no clear notion who these visiting justices will be. They are not to be elected by the quarter sessions as their committee or delegation; they are merely to be recommended by the Court of Quarter Sessions to the Secretary of State, who will nominate such as he may approve; there may be an election, but it is the nomination by the Home Secretary which is to be effective, and these justices, when nominated, are to visit the gaols only as the Home Secretary may direct, and then report, not to quarter sessions, but to him; otherwise their visits will be totally unauthoritative. It is true that there has been inserted in the Bill a general vague permission for other justices to visit the prisons; but when they make these visits they will have no authority except such as shall be committed to them by the Secretary of State, unless it be to order punishment at the instance of the master of the prison, who is to be an officer appointed by the right hon. Gentleman, not appointed by the justices themselves. I think I have gone sufficiently through this Bill to show that it in no sense tends to a continuation of the principle of local self-government, with which the whole Act of 1865 is pregnant. Some of the details of that Act are preserved, but not one jot of its main principle. This is a great change, and I think anything but Conservative, although it is a re-actionary change, towards that system of centralized authority which exists in foreign countries. I know some

hon. Members are so worried by the protracted proceedings of this House that they are ready to make over almost any amount of power and authority to the Executive merely to relieve themselves from attendance in this House, but, as country Gentlemen, they may find this self-indulgence costly. The Home Secretary has no right to complain of the extent to which this Bill has been discussed. If he, a Conservative official, introduces a re-actionary, and not a Conservative measure, it is the duty of this House to make him feel the responsibility he incurs. I am convinced that it is the growing dislike among the Members of the House to this measure that has induced the House so long to delay its passage. That delay has, in my opinion, been perfectly justifiable, for it is a good ground of opposition to any measure that the country remains in ignorance of its character. My own belief is that anticipations of economy, which have induced the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), and the small knot who direct the action of the Central Chamber of Agriculture to promote this Bill, rest upon grounds at once narrow and deceptive. The hon. Member for South Norfolk and the hon. Member for South Leicestershire have gained great credit for indiscriminately opposing every measure which might have added a penny in the pound upon the rates; but they carry this system much too far when they support this Bill with that single aim. A good deal has been done in this sense. I do not complain of that, because the House at one time seemed inclined to care too little how heavily it might burden the rates; but when it comes to this—that for the sake of saving a halfpenny in the pound we are to have this great political change introduced, this narrow economy carries hon. Members and the House too far. There has been another agency at work. We have had the officers of the Convict department of the Civil Service, and notably Colonel Ducane, vilifying the justices, from a desire, I suppose, to extend the sphere of employment for Government officials. There has been yet another agency at work. The origin of this attack upon the system of local government in this country is within our memory. With respect to the county prisons, the movement in 1862 was originated by the Roman Catholic hierarchy. Some hon. Members seem disposed to doubt this. I will, therefore, read to the House an extract from The Tablet, a newspaper which was then, and is now, an organ of the Roman Catholic hierarchy. On the 17th May, 1862, it contained a letter from the Rev. Canon Morris, secretary of the committee appointed to prepare a Bill to remedy the alleged grievances of Roman Catholics in convict, county, and borough gaols. His letter states that several meetings on the subject had been held in London.

“ A sub-committee was appointed, consisting of the Honourable Charles Langdale, Canon O’Neal, V.G., and Mr. Ryley, with myself as secretary, to prepare a Bill, which would represent a complete remedy for all the grievances of Catholics, both in convict and county or borough gaols. This Bill, when prepared, was submitted to his Eminence (Cardinal Wiseman) and the Bishops in Low Week, and at the meeting which has just been held it has been resolved that the sub-committee be requested to take steps for its immediate introduction into Parliament.”

This is from The Tablet of the 17th of May, 1862, but on the 24th of May it was further announced in The Tablet—

“ We have the satisfaction of once more reporting progress on the prison question. Our readers are already aware that at a meeting held some weeks ago at the Stafford Club it was resolved that a Bill, dealing with the whole case, should be prepared; they are also aware that this Bill has been prepared and submitted to the Bishops, by whom it was approved. Another meeting was held at the Stafford Club, at which it was resolved that a sub-committee, consisting of the Very Rev. Canons O’Neal and Morris, Sir Charles Clifford and Mr. Ryley, should be requested to take all necessary steps for the immediate introduction of the Bill into Parliament. In pursuance of this resolution, the sub-committee met and resolved on requesting Mr. Pope Hennessy, M.P., to take charge of the Bill. We are happy to add that Mr. Hennessy has consented to do so, and that in the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons, among the Notices given on Wednesday, May 20, appears the following:—‘ Mr. Hennessy: Roman Catholic Prisoners Bill to amend the Law relating to the Religious Instruction of Roman Catholic Prisoners in England and Wales, Tuesday, May 27.’ ”

This is my authority for the statement I have made. When that Bill came to be discussed it was found that the purport of it was to give the Roman Catholic Bishops power to appoint a chaplain for every gaol in which any considerable number of Roman Catholic prisoners were confined; and that where no such chaplain was appointed and paid out of the rates, a priest should be less regularly, but still actually, appointed by the Bishops, and that these Roman Catholic priests should have access at all times to the prisoners, notwithstanding any prison regulations. That was the beginning of this attack. Sir George Grey was then Home Secretary, and objected to this Bill as subversive of prison discipline; and in 1863 he introduced a Bill of his own, meeting in some degree the Roman Catholic demand, but preserving the authority of the visiting justices. The Roman Catholic hierarchy were not satisfied with that Bill, and continued, through their Representatives in this House and otherwise, to attack the county justices, because the principle was preserved that the attendance by the Roman Catholic chaplains on the prisoners should be regulated by the visiting justices, and the acceptance of these priests’ ministration was not made compulsory on the prisoners. The agitation continued, and in 1865 the Prisons Act was passed; but this Act preserved intact the local jurisdiction of the justices of the peace, which the Bill of Mr. Pope Hennessy, introduced in 1862, would have invalidated, and which this Bill proposes to sweep away altogether. I hope the House will forgive my having gone through these details of evidence; but as I was a Member of the House during the years 1862, 1863, and 1865, and as the right hon. Gentleman was not a Member, and was, consequently, comparatively ignorant of the proceedings which led up to the Act of 1865, I may be excused for thinking that when he launched this Bill, containing the transfer of such enormous powers to the Home Secretary, he may have commenced action without being personally cognizant of the circumstances that led to the introduction of the Bill of 1865. I am aware that the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon), who co-operated with me in some details, is in favour of this measure generally. I regret that such seems to be his inclination. My object in rising is this—It may be that Parliament will decide in favour of this great change in the administration of justice; but I am strongly of opinion that the House has sanctioned this Bill under circumstances and at a time when the vital magnitude of the change proposed was not adequately foreseen. I rejoice, however, to find that many of the Liberal Party have opposed this Bill, and that they seem to be becoming conscious that if they are to be worthy inheritors of the great traditions of the whole Whig Party, who were in years gone by the defenders of constitutional freedom in this country, they must act in a Conservative sense, when a Government, supposed to be Conservative, adopts reactionary measures of this type.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON, while expressing his concurrence in almost everything which had fallen from the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Taylor), would remind him that the present Bill did not introduce flogging or any of the other punishments to which he had referred, though he regretted as much as his hon. Friend that the Home Secretary had not found himself in a position to deal boldly with those brutal and brutalizing punishments by sweeping them away altogether. He could not, however, on that account withhold his support from a measure which would mitigate the severity of the lot of political prisoners, and make better provision for the care of those who were detained in our gaols before conviction. He was sorry to find that so poor an opinion had been expressed of the justices, and that if this Bill passed, they would no longer visit the prisons. He could not recognize the connection between the office of a justice of the peace and that of goaler of which some hon. Gentlemen seemed so tenacious. On the other hand, he thought that the justices could perform no nobler work in connection with the prisons than that of standing between the prisoners and the Crown, and preventing an abuse of authority. Again, the Bill would shut up at first 70 useless prisons, re-organize others, and bring them all into combination, under one uniform system of discipline. It was desirable that we should have a prison discipline of which our criminals would stand in awe, and that we should no longer hear that criminals selected the district in which to commit crime, because the discipline in one district was lighter than that in another. With regard to the objections raised to the Bill, on the ground of its centralizing character, he saw no reason why prisons should be looked upon as local institutions. They formed part, so to speak, of the criminal law of the country, and they ought to belong to the country at large. He did not believe that the county gentlemen would cease to take an interest in the prisons if this Bill were passed. There would be ample scope for their energies, seeing that they would be able to make their complaints heard in the House of Commons. Considering the objects of the Bill, he could not understand objections to it on the ground of economy. He regretted that the Secretary of State had not acceded to the proposal he made the other night to allow Parliament to have a complete control over the prison rules he proposed to make. While he would not say that the measure was without faults, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman in introducing it had done one of the most signal and beneficial acts of his official life. He gave it his most cordial support.

MR. DODSON said, this Bill was introduced last year for the purpose of affording relief to local taxation and the establishment of absolute economy; and in the Speech from the Throne this year economy was put forward as the main object of the Bill; but as the discussion of the measure had gone on, less and less was said about economy in the transfer of the prisons to the Government. The great argument now was uniformity of prison management. In proposing to take away the management of the prisons from the local authorities, economy and the relief of local taxation had been offered as a quid pro quo. If the object had simply been to secure uniformity of management, that could have been done by means of rules, without transferring all power and patronage to the Government. In introducing the Bill last year, the right hon. Gentleman anticipated that it would lead to a saving of £100,000 a-year; £50,000 he expected would be gained by greater efficiency of labour, while £50,000 would be saved by reducing the number of prisons in the country. Was the right hon. Gentleman still as sanguine on the point of economy? Gentlemen who had analyzed the prison statistics had come to the conclusion that if the right hon. Gentleman closed 54 prisons, there would be a saving of only £21,000. It was to be remembered, moreover, that concessions had been made, not in the direction of economy, for the right hon. Gentleman had undertaken to compensate local authorities in respect of superfluous prison accommodation. In connection with the subject of prison labour, the Secretary of State had already found, and in future would probably find his duties under the Bill invidious and difficult. It might be expected also that there would be an immense increase in the number of Questions put to him in that House with reference to the treatment of prisoners when he had assumed the exclusive responsibility. Another great responsibility which the right hon. Gentleman had undertaken was the framing of rules for the regulation of prisons. Those rules were to lie 40 days on the Table of the House, and it was to be hoped that they would actually be presented, and not, like some other rules, lie there for great part of the time only in dummy. With regard to the centralizing character of the Bill, he could not but think that if the visiting justices came into collision with the officials of the central Government, they would find the influence of the latter too strong for them, and they would be sent to the wall. He maintained that in all cases where centralization was not necessary, or highly expedient, it should be abstained from, or abandoned. After all the discussion on the Bill, he still retained his former doubt whether its advantages would be compensated by its disadvantages. He suggested that his hon. Friend would content himself with having protested against the Bill, and not put the House to the trouble of a division.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I have not very much to say with respect to this Bill, because I have already troubled the House very often. I must, however, object very decidedly to one word that fell from the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), for he said that there had been "precipitate" action in the matter. Well, there was a very long debate last year, such as hardly any Bill ever went through before, and a most decisive expression of opinion, as the second reading was carried by an almost unprecedented majority. I am bound to say that I can never expect such a majority again. Since that time the Bill has been completely discussed throughout the country, and the general conclusion is that it is a good Bill, and a wise one, and ought to pass into law. I hope that nothing I have said will lead any hon. Member to suppose that I wish to prolong the debate, now that the subject has been discussed—and very properly—at much length. I may say that the speech of the hon. Member for Burnley is a most valuable index to the debates, and any one referring to it will find a summary of everything that can be said, or suggested, or imagined against the Bill. He has spoken of the increase of local rates and taxation. I wish he had mentioned two matters connected with it, and that when he touched upon this vital question, he had stated the cause of the increase and the increase of local taxation in the municipalities. The hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) said that his objection to the Bill—his sole objection almost—was that it did not abolish flogging. At all events, if the Bill does not go so far as that, it includes better safeguards against the abuse of flogging than have been embodied in any previous measure. While I am touching upon this subject, I must allude to Holloway Prison. Some time ago, a letter was made public which gave strong expression to the notion that all manner of hardships went on in that prison, and I made it my first duty to communicate with the authorities. In consequence, I have here a long statement in contradiction to that letter. I am bound, however, to say that the writer of the statement alleging cruelties is a person who has been given to intoxicating drinks for a long time, his health became so seriously affected as to require his confinement in the lunatic asylum; and during his stay in Holloway Prison knives and other sharp instruments were always kept out of his way, so that his meat had to be cut for him. I wish to explain that when he wrote that letter he was very probably suffering from some mental affection which warped his judgment. The statement of the authorities is too long for me to read, but it is a substantial denial of every accusation. I have also in my hand a letter, of which, if the House will allow me, I will read one sentence without naming the writer, for that is the condition on which I may use the letter, but I will show the seal to the hon. Member for Leicester afterwards. The writer says—

“The extraordinary statement of cruelties furnished by Mr. P. Taylor appears to me to be so far from the truth that, in the public interest, I come forward to refute it. I am a man who suffered 12 months’ imprisonment in Holloway Gaol, but I never saw or heard of one single act of cruelty beyond the strict discipline of the prison; nor do I believe these charges.”

The hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) naturally went to a considerable length in comparing the expenses of the county and borough prisons. He must remember, however, that there is a great difference in the number of persons required to look after them. One of the prisons particularly mentioned—that of Woking—is practically a hospital and not a prison; and, so far as I know, the only fault of the Lancashire prisons is that the county is too proud of them. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) is a persistent opponent of the Bill, but I cannot follow his argument about the Common Law, and I cannot understand whether it is his opinion that the Secretary of State or the visiting justices will have too much power under this Act. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Dodson) has asked me four questions, and I will answer them very briefly. First, as to the question of economy, that matter has been considered very carefully, and I believe that £50,000 may be saved both in the one case and the other. But the compensation to counties and boroughs which the House thought proper to agree to, must be deducted from any saving that may be made. I believe the hon. Member for Burnley was one who voted in the majority on that point, and compelled the Government to yield to what was proposed. With regard to prison labour, there are, no doubt, great difficulties in administering that part of the Bill. But it is more likely that prison labour will interfere much less with the ordinary run of labour throughout the country when it is in one hand than when it is in many hands. Then the right hon. Gentleman says that many more Questions will be asked of the Secretary of State as to the treatment of prisoners than have been asked hitherto. My answer to that is this—if the treatment of prisoners is bad, the more Questions asked the better; if the treatment is good, the more easy to answer them. Then the right hon. Gentleman says that the rules must be laid on the Table for 40 days. I am glad that he pressed that subject on the attention of the House; the question of the rules will be considered during the Recess, and the rules will be laid on the Table. I will not take up any more time, but will only express a hope that the House will agree to the third reading of the Bill without a division.

MR. PARNELL thought that a great opportunity had been lost by the Liberal Party in not fulfilling what he considered to be the proper mission of the Liberal Party in Opposition in reference to such a Bill as this. There could be no doubt that the legislation of the present Government had been marked by a centralizing tendency. They pledged themselves on coming into office to direct their attention to measures of a domestic character, and not to continue the sensational legislation of the late Government. It was also understood that they intended to take the ground from under the feet of those Liberal Members who had endeavoured to promote the power and spread the number of local institutions and local self-government. He was much struck by some remarks of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), who told them that if the Government went on in that way, by introducing measures like the Valuation Bill, they would gradually do away with the raison d'être for the existence and for the establishment of county government. He was thankful for the support he had received when endeavouring to improve the treatment of political prisoners, both during and after trial; but, at the same time, he could not help regretting that a great opportunity had been lost by the Liberal Party. This Bill held out a sort of bribe to the ratepayers, in the shape of a fancied reduction of the rates; but in reality it would effect no such reduction, and the ratepayers would find that the money for the support of the prisons would still come out of their pockets, though not exactly in the same way as before. What was the action of the Conservatives who represented the interests of the unpaid justices of England? From the first they introduced Amendments in favour of their own order. They were most indefatigable in their attendance and in their hostility to such portions of the Bill as seemed to trench on their privileges. Many provisions had been introduced saving the power of visiting justices, and giving powers which the Home Secretary did not contemplate when he introduced the Bill. He should have preferred, if this question had been postponed by the Government until they had dealt with the system of county government in England, Scotland, and Ireland. When they had completed that legislation, it would have been a noble act to have handed over these prisons to the county authorities. However, they could not now hope to stop the progress of the Bill; and he had seen the necessity for this Bill becoming law. He hoped the hon. Member for Burnley would not take a division at this stage.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK testified to the character of the Governor of Holloway Prison as an able, kind, and judicious officer, and one who had the thorough confidence of the magistrates. That gentleman had written a letter to him, in which he had stated that the charges of cruelty and violence to prisoners, of the use of thumb-screws, of the fastening of prisoners to walls and starving them, and other such accusations were totally untrue. All the prison officers stated that these things were merely creations of the imagination. The Governor added that he had never seen a thumb-screw in his life.

MR. BIGGAR noticed several objections to the Bill, and remarked that the Government had refused to give the House the option of affirming or not affirming the rules adopted for prisons. He thought additional facilities should have been given for enabling Roman Catholic prisoners to have chaplains of their own faith. He thought also that it would have been well if the Government had agreed to a clause abolishing flogging entirely in prisons.

MR. RYLANDS said, after the discussion which had taken place, he would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

[BILL 184.] COMMITTEE.

(In the Committee.)

On Question, "That the Preamble be postponed,"

MR. BIGGAR said, he had risen before the right hon. Gentleman left the Chair with the view to offering some observations upon this Bill, and also with the intention of dividing the House against it. He would not charge the Speaker with having intentionally neglected to see him; but he felt he had reason to complain, that in consequence of the right hon. Gentleman having left the Chair he was precluded from taking the course he had intended. He would consequently move that Progress be reported. In his opinion, this Bill really was not required. It was founded upon some idea that Ireland ought to follow England in an amendment of the Judicial system; but so far as he could make out the English Judicature Bill had proved an entire failure. He thought, at all events, that the Bill for Ireland might have been postponed till the experiment had been tried longer in England. Those in charge of the Irish Business of the Government would have displayed more intelligence if they had pressed forward the County Courts Bill, which was a measure greatly needed, and which really provided Courts for the poor man, in preference to the present Bill.

SIR JOHN HAY thought it was only due to the right hon. Gentleman who presided with such dignity and fairness over the House to say that the House had actually given its assent to the Question that he leave the Chair before the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) rose. ["No, no!"] While the right hon. Gentleman was leaving the Chair the hon. Member was moving up from his place, and the Speaker was justified in assuming that he was going to speak upon a question in Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, he was quite confident that the right hon. Gentleman (the Speaker) had no intention of preventing discussion on this or any Bill introduced into the House, nor, he need hardly say, had the Government. He pointed out that the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) would have every opportunity of discussing the measure, and on the Question now before the House, that the Preamble be postponed, it was quite competent for him, or for other hon. Members, to make any observation, on the general scope of the Bill. This was not the first occasion on which the Bill had been introduced into the House. It was now the third year, and he did not think it unreasonable in him to assume that the provisions and policy of the Bill were before hon. Members from Ireland. As to the working of the English Judicature Act, he thought the hon. Member was wrong in stating that it was an entire failure. The discussions which had taken place in the House, and the views expressed by the hon. and learned Members for Taunton (Sir Henry James) and Durham (Mr. Herschell), did not show it to be so. As far as he had been able to find out the arrears of business were far less than at any former time; while a shorter time than formerly now elapsed between the commencement of a cause and its final conclusion. As to the Irish County Courts Bill, he was most anxious to promote its passing; but it was a Bill the discussion of which would occupy a long time. It had not been long before the House, whereas this was the third Session the present Bill had been before the House. The Government could hardly hope to pass the County Courts Bill except they had considerable time at their disposal; and, therefore, although he had no desire to postpone legislation on the subject, he hoped that the House would, under existing circumstances, proceed with the consideration of the measure not before it.

MR. BIGGAR wished to disclaim any intention of imputing unfairness to the Speaker, but to point out that immediately the Question was put from the Chair he rose, and, in the only way it was possible for him to call attention to the fact that he had risen, addressed the Speaker. Considerable confusion had, no doubt, prevailed in the House at the time, in consequence of hon. Members leaving the House after the debate on the Prisons Bill. He did not want unnecessarily to obstruct the present Bill; but he thought they ought to have some explanation of its provisions from the Attorney General.

MR. MELDON said, no Member was more strongly convinced than himself of the inutility of this Bill. It really was not wanted at all, and it was the unanimous belief among both branches of the legal Profession in Ireland that things were well enough without any change. He did not, however, think it was of any use opposing it; because it was quite out of the question that the Government would allow things to remain as they were in Ireland after the great change which had taken place in England. If a change was to take place, it was desirable that it should be effected as soon as possible, and that an end should be put to the present state of uncertainty, which was so injurious both to the Profession and the public. For his own part, he thought that the Government were much to blame for not having pressed on this Bill rather than the Universities Bill and the Prisons Bill. Although he was strongly opposed to the Bill, he would, therefore, urge his Colleagues not to obstruct its passage, which he regarded as inevitable. Anything would be better than the continuance of a state of things in which no one knew where he stood, or what he had to expect. Once over, he believed that the Judicature Act would work better in Ireland than in England; because in the former country the Profession were conversant both with Common Law and with Equity, and because, owing to the smaller amount of business, the Judges could take more time to see how a new system should be worked.

MR. PARNELL objected to being deprived of the opportunity of addressing the House on the Question that the Speaker should leave the Chair. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) that there were defects in the present state of Judicature in Ireland; but he did not consider that the Bill would remedy those defects, and he should therefore oppose the passing of the Bill. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had had an Amendment for some weeks on the Paper to oppose the Bill being considered in Committee, and that Amendment he (Mr. Parnell) intended to support; but the Amendment had disappeared from the Paper, and when the hon. Member went to the Clerk at the Table to inquire why it had been omitted, he was told that some Gentleman came to him and told him that he had the hon. Member's authority to withdraw the Amendment, and so it was not inserted in the Paper. The absence of the Notice was, no doubt, the reason why the attention of the Speaker was not directed to the hon. Member. They were not placed in a position of opposing the Bill, as they would have been had the Amendment not been got rid of; and unless the Attorney General for Ireland would consent to replace them in the position in which they were before, he (Mr. Parnell) should feel bound to offer the Bill an opposition which in the present state of Public Business would render its passing simply impossible. He should, therefore, support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan, and if that were negatived he should himself make another.

DR. WARD said, that it was an extraordinary thing for the Government to ask the House to assent to a Bill which would commit the House to the maintenance of an excessive Judicial Staff in the Superior Courts in Ireland at the very time they were promoting a County Courts Bill, which would greatly diminish the amount of business now before the Superior Courts, and was confessedly inadequate to occupy their time. He should, therefore, under present circumstances, feel it his duty to oppose the Bill now before them.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, the Irish Courts had been in the habit of shaping their decisions on the jurisprudence of this country, and, therefore, he hoped this Bill would be allowed to pass as a small instalment of justice to Ireland. It would be felt as a very great grievance by many.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he was quite sure that the general desire of the Committee was to have a full discussion on the Bill. He thought also that the hon. Member for Cavan would admit that the Government were justified in supposing that the hon. Member had no intention of pressing the Amendment which he had put down on the Paper after it had disappeared from the Paper. He understood that after the Speaker had left the Chair the rule was that any hon. Member who had a Notice of Amendment on the Paper was entitled to be called upon by the Chairman before it would be possible for the Bill to be re-committed. He therefore thought it was obvious that such a proposal as that now made could not be listened to. What was the position of the hon. Member for Cavan? The Question was, that the Preamble be postponed, and on that Question there was, to a certain extent, an opportunity of discussing the principle of the Bill. There was, of course, another Motion, which the hon. Gentleman was at liberty to make—namely, that the Chairman should leave the Chair, or that Progress should be reported. As those two opportunities were open to the hon. Member, he thought it was not unreasonable for the Government to ask that they should now be allowed to hear the objections which were taken to the Bill itself.

MR. SHAW could not understand why the English Law Bills had not been pushed forward, especially as no opposition had been offered to them by the Irish Members. He thought that if the County Courts Bill and the present measure were referred to a Select Committee composed entirely of lawyers, who would be able to mould them into shape, there would be no difficulty in passing both Bills this Session.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY thought the County Courts Bill deserved prior attention to this Bill. He considered that in Ireland, at the present time, the Judges were fully worked; but when the change of taking away some of the inferior business out of their hands was carried out, he was very much mistaken if a considerable reduction of the number of Judges in the Superior Courts would not be possible.

MR. HERSCHELL remarked that there were always professional prejudices when new measures were proposed. Since the introduction of the English Judicature Bill a very great saving of time had been effected in carrying causes through, and the Irish people would be getting a real advantage if they got this Bill passed.

MR. BRUEN thought that the hon. Gentlemen who objected to this Bill being taken before the County Courts Bill had had ample opportunities, if they had chosen, of bringing the question before the House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, he

perfectly sympathized with the remarks made by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) with respect to the County Courts Bill; but, at the same time, the Government were very anxious that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. It stood as an Order for Thursday, but was objected to by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) and two others, so that it could not be considered after a certain time. He therefore hoped that the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) would withdraw his opposition to the present measure, which was really necessary to accomplish several reforms in the Irish Judicial system.

MR. MELDON did not think that a reference of the County Courts Bill to a Committee would do any good, because they could not provide a proper staff for the working of the Act.

MR. GRAY said, he did not intend to discuss the merits of this proposal; but he had always understood that that House was exceedingly jealous of its privileges, and of the privileges of what were called private Members. It appeared to him that something like a wrong — an unintentional wrong, perhaps — had been done to a private Member. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had put a Notice on the Paper. It seemed that by some means his Notice had been removed without the hon. Member's knowledge or consent. He had no doubt whatever that the removal was accidental; but the effect of the removal had been to the prejudice of the hon. Member, and this prejudice had been done through no default of his own. Certainly, it appeared to him that the proper course to pursue under the circumstances would be to re-commit the Bill, and he thought the hon. Member had a moral right to insist on that being done. If that should be refused him, and the hon. Member should to any extent use obstruction afterwards, it would be within his moral right. If the Government suffered any inconvenience afterwards through not conceding the request of the hon. Member, then the Government would only have itself to blame for what would happen.

MR. BIGGAR thought there was not sufficient time to pass the Bill this Session, and, therefore, the Government ought not to proceed with it.

It being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress: to sit again upon Friday, at Two of the clock.

The House suspended its sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN rose to call attention to the Reports of the Court Martial Commission in 1869, and to the confused and complicated provisions of the existing Mutiny Act and Articles of War; and to move that a Select Committee be appointed—

“To inquire into the present state of our Military Law, including the constitution and practice of Courts-Martial and Courts of Inquiry, and to report to this House the principles upon which the revision of the Mutiny Acts and Articles of War should be carried out, and how best this revision should take place so as to ensure legislation on the subject in the next Session of Parliament.”

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCOMOTIVES ON COMMON ROADS

BILL.—[BILL 22.]

(Colonel Chaplin, Mr. Charles Praed,
Mr. Samuelson.)

Order for Second Reading read.

COLONEL CHAPLIN, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the object of the measure was to consolidate the existing law and to introduce some Amendments into it. That the present Bill was perfect he did not pretend to say—on the contrary, he believed many improvements might be introduced in Committee. He might fairly say that the existing law relating to locomotives on common roads was faulty:—nor was this to be wondered at when they reflected on the enormous strides that had taken place within the last few years in machinery of every description, and remembered that the Act regulating the use of locomotives on roads was passed in 1861, and that since that time, with the exception of an amending Act in 1865, no legislation had taken place on the subject. It seemed to him, therefore, that the subject required and deserved immediate attention not only in the interest of those who used locomotives, but for the safety of the whole community. The first object to be aimed at in dealing with the question was the safety and convenience of the public; and the second should be the expansion of the general industry of the country, so far as they could do so. Some years ago great prejudices existed against the introduction of steam engines on common roads, and some persons who had heard that he had brought in a Bill on that subject had expressed a wish that he would put a stop to those nasty things altogether. That had been said partly under the idea that those machines damaged the roads, but mainly because they were ugly, and also because they might frighten horses. Those prejudices still existed, though perhaps in a modified form; and he thought that by judicious legislation that unsatisfactory state of things might be put an end to altogether. He did not, however, believe that either the House or the country would listen to a proposal for prohibiting altogether the use of locomotives on public roads—they were now so extensively used throughout the country that they might be said to have become a necessity. As to the last objection—he had had considerable experience in regard to horses both on town and country roads, and his conviction was that the danger apprehended in that case generally arose much more from the ignorance of those who had charge of horses than from any real danger through the use of locomotives. He thought that bicycles were really more dangerous than locomotives. Considering the rapid progress made in our days by mechanical science, it was obviously impossible to frame a law on that subject which would endure for all time, without requiring a revision; and early this Session a Select Committee was appointed to consider how far, and under what regulations, steam or other mechanical power might be allowed to be employed on tramways and public roads. That Committee had before it the Report made by a similar Committee which sat in 1873, and gave it as their opinion that in that Report there were sufficient materials to form the foundation of future legislation. They expressed their concurrence in its main recommendations, among which were these—that the direct legislation affecting the use of locomotives on common roads should be consolidated into one Act, and that that Act should not be temporary in its duration. He hoped, therefore, he was not presumptuous in now endeavouring to consolidate the law on that subject. With regard to the duration of the Act, he understood the recommendation to which he had referred to mean that they should pass a law which would last as long as possible, not one that could be expected to last for all time. The inquiry made by the Committee of 1873 appeared to have been exhaustive and complete. They took evidence, among other things, as to the large amount of capital invested in those engines, which rendered the question involved one of importance to the employers of labour. Four years had since elapsed, and it was the unanimous testimony of all the manufacturers of those machines that the ratio of increase in their use in this country within the last five years had greatly exceeded that of any former period. The evidence taken in 1873 with respect to horses was somewhat contradictory, as was only to be expected when different interests were concerned; but the Committee found that even those witnesses who were opposed to the employment of locomotives on public roads admitted that horses soon got used to the sight and the sound of those engines. That entirely agreed with his own experience; and he maintained that any infinitesimal danger which might arise in spite of proper regulations and precautions could not for a moment counterbalance the enormous advantages resulting from the use of steam power on the roads. As to the question of the damage done to the roads by the wheels and tires of locomotives coming in contact with them, the Act of 1861—the first Act regulating the use of locomotives on common roads—dealt with that matter. Since then, however, immense improvements had been made in the construction of wheels, and he thought that our legislation on that head should have due regard to the present conditions of mechanical science. The object, of course, should be to secure the roads against all unnecessary and avoidable injury from the passing of locomotives along their surfaces. The result of the operation of the law as it existed was that the owners of engines were often compelled to break it, and it was monstrous, in his opinion, that they should be obliged to use wheels by which unnecessary damage was done to the roads. Then there was the system of licensing, to which, for his own part, he was rather opposed, as tending to relieve the owners of engines from that sense of responsibility by which it was desirable they should be influenced. As to the requirement that a red flag should be carried 60 yards in advance of an engine, he thought it an useless precaution—and, more than that, the evidence which had been given before the Committee showed that it had the effect of frightening horses to a considerable extent. He had introduced a clause into the Bill providing for an appeal to the President of the Local Government Board. These and many other matters of detail could be advantageously dealt with in Committee. It only remained for him to say that, although he believed there were some persons who desired to see the use of locomotives on our roads done away with altogether, yet that was not the view taken by the community generally, who believed them to be a necessity to the country: and, moreover, the experience which had been already gained in working them had shown that they could be constructed on an improved plan, so that they might be employed without doing any injury to the roads. The question really was—whether Parliament should or should not sanction the permanent use of locomotives on common roads, and whether the time had not come when such sanction should not be legislatively given?

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Colonel Chaplin.)

MR. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT said, that he had always taken an interest in this subject; and although he had opposed a Bill dealing with it introduced by the late Mr. Cawley, he was now of opinion that some measure with respect to it ought to be passed. Such a measure should, however, in his opinion, be brought forward by the Government, and should not be in the hands of a private Member; and, further, the question had to be considered whether, under the present disorganized state of the law in reference to highways and turnpike trusts, it was at present practicable to pass any useful measure in reference to the use of road locomotive engines upon them. The hon. and gallant Member had referred to the evidence taken before the Select Committee of 1873 and its favourable character; but he believed that out of the 15 witnesses examined, 12 of them were interested in manufacturing, and in otherwise promoting the use of locomotives on common roads. He did not say that this necessarily gave a bias to their views; but still they must keep the fact in view in weighing the evidence. He could from his own experience state that a great deal of damage was done to roads by locomotives, and it was no wonder it should be so, seeing that they were not constructed to bear such heavy burdens. To render them fit for the purpose would cost a large sum of money. He did not know whether any active opposition was intended to the Bill; but if no more cogent arguments were adduced in its favour than had yet been offered, he felt disposed to ask his hon. and gallant Friend to withdraw the Bill.

ADMIRAL SIR WILLIAM EDMONSTONE said, he was strongly opposed to machines of this description being allowed upon our public roads, the surface of which they ruthlessly cut up, and broke down the bridges. So far as Scotland was concerned, he was sure the roads were not sufficiently strongly made to bear the enormous weights put upon them by these machines. At the present moment they had a Bill before the House of Commons—the Roads and Bridges Bill—and it was a very important matter for the country to consider whether, if a Bill of the description they were now considering should be sanctioned by the House, the whole country would not soon be covered with engines of that description. But he objected to it also in the interests of horses—indeed, he was much surprised that an hon. and gallant Member, who was so much interested in horses, should have brought in this Bill. It was all very well to say that horses would get accustomed to the machines—he himself had known instances over and over again where horses could never get accustomed to them. While, however, objecting strongly to the use of these engines, he was not at the present moment prepared formally to oppose the second reading of the Bill, but merely wished to enter his protest against it.

MR. MONK said, he was sorry that his attention had not been earlier called to the provisions of this Bill. He agreed that it would be well if they could pass a consolidation Bill upon this subject: but this Bill did more—it proposed many alterations in the law; and, moreover, it was very defective—it did not provide for the consumption of the smoke, nor propose any limitation to the weight of the engines; nor did it propose any means by which those who used them should compensate for the enormous damage they did to the roads. He also thought that a measure of this sort could only be introduced with advantage on the authority of the Government, for it would be utterly impossible for a private Member to obtain the information necessary to guide the House in dealing with it. Under the circumstances, he did not think that it would be desirable to read the Bill a second time.

MR. ASSHETON said, he very much concurred in the remarks of the last speaker, and wished the Government could have taken up the subject; but, seeing that their hands were already so full of business, he thought the House was indebted to his hon. and gallant Friend for the pains he had bestowed on the subject. As to the danger arising from the frightening of horses, he was not disposed to attach very much importance to that point—what frightened them was the snorting of the engine; but there would be no difficulty in providing that an engine should be noiseless, as he had been informed was the case in Paris. The red flag, too, ought, in his opinion, to be done away with; and as to the damage to bridges, those who subjected them to the strain of unreasonably heavy loads ought to repair them. He might also observe that the regulation as to the rate of speed of locomotives sometimes operated very harshly; so that it would be well that no hard-and-fast line as to pace should be laid down. He hoped, he might add, to see light passenger locomotives soon running on our roads, going at the rate of nine or ten miles an hour. That would be no novelty, for in 1834 or 1835 an engine constructed in Glasgow used to run a short distance from that city with passengers, and was very successful; but so great was the opposition offered by the trustees of the road to the experiment, that it had to be given up. They raised the tolls; and, that step failing, they covered the road with new broken stone, so that the wheels were shattered daily, and had to be replaced by others made during the night. At last, so great was the strain that a boiler blew out and all the passengers were killed. It was clear, however, that but for the opposition which had been offered to it, the experiment would have gone on satisfactorily; and, entertaining that view, he should vote for the present Bill if the second reading were pressed; although, considering the large interests involved in the question, and the amount of consideration which it required, he hoped the House would not be put to the trouble of a division.

MR. M'LAREN said, this seemed to him to be a very crude Bill, and required a great deal of adjustment. He thought, indeed, that no Bill could be satisfactory on this subject unless it was introduced on the responsibility of Government. As an instance of the careless way in which the clauses were framed, he might mention that by Clause 9 the authorities of any borough or town in England with a population of 5,000, or upwards, by the last Census, might regulate the speed of locomotives through their streets; but the very next sub-section applied to Scotland, and said that this power should only be vested in the authorities of any town of 10,000 inhabitants or upwards. Therefore, the framers of the Bill seemed to contemplate that the interests of less than 10,000 people in Scotch towns were not worth taking care of. He was sorry that so many of the Home Rule Members were not present to look after the interests of their country—there was no restriction whatever in the Bill as to the towns of Ireland, and therefore no authority there had power to remedy any evil connected with the use of locomotives on roads; although Clause 13 said that the county surveyors in Ireland might regulate other kinds of locomotives than those stated in the Act. He thought that the Bill, apart altogether from the principle of allowing locomotives to run on public roads, was so crudely drawn up, that it should either be withdrawn by its promoters or negatived by the House.

MR. WHEELHOUSE, while he should be one of the very last to say that the use of locomotives should be entirely prohibited on roads, thought that notwithstanding the provisions of the Bill as to the regulations local authorities would be empowered to make to ensure safe passage along the streets of large towns, he feared that if these locomotives were once permitted to be taken through them we should get into a difficulty out of which it would be impossible to see our way. Not only the streets had to be considered, but there were the passengers on foot and horses and carriages. It should be remembered how in our larger mercantile cities there were continually passing day and night lorries carrying scores of loads from the manufactories to the railway depôts, and that in these towns the passing of locomotives along their streets became a question of the gravest importance. The traffic should be developed, he admitted—no one was more anxious to assist in this—but, at the same time, it must be done safely. He entertained no unreasonable objection to traffic being conducted through the streets, if only it could be so carried on, and upon regulations framed, not by a private Member, but by the responsible Government of the country. In all these matters public safety, irrespective of all other considerations, first claimed attention; and when he looked at the streets of his own borough, even though they had been so largely improved during the last 30 years, and when he remembered the large towns in the West Riding of Yorkshire, with their comparatively narrow streets formed long ago, he was compelled to come to the opinion that, unless under the strictest regulations were imposed by Government, it might be endangering the lives of the inhabitants. In referring to the population of the towns he had indicated, it must be remembered that flocks of people—men, women, and children—had to pass along the streets at certain hours, often in the dark, or the grey of the winter mornings or evenings, some miles perhaps between the factories and their homes, and on their way these crowds would have to pass these engines. He did not speak of country districts. He could quite understand that provisions ought to be made to meet agricultural requirements and agrarian interests as far as it was desirable. But he was speaking from what he had observed, that the danger to horse and carriage traffic and to foot passengers inflicted by steam engines might be something no one could fully appreciate who had not lived, as he had for some months every year, in one of the largest manufacturing towns in Yorkshire. As he understood the Bill, any person owning an engine or employing one would be at liberty to take it through the streets, no matter what might be the damage caused to the roads, and there was nothing requiring those persons to pay for the repair of such roads so damaged. The only exception was in case of damage to bridges. But were the ratepayers to be called upon to repair the roads so broken up? Most of them did not care about the engines, which were used for a limited interest only, the general public having no concern in them. In fact, if the public were consulted the general feeling would be found that they would rather not see the engines. They made horses restive and endangered carriage traffic. It was not unreasonable, then, that they should object to repair the roads damaged by the locomotives. It was no individual instance he was placing before the House; but they were dealing with a question so large that every aspect of the case should be presented and put responsibility of doing anything the upon the shoulders of the Government. With all deference to the introducer of the Bill, he doubted whether any private Member could get at the information necessary to initiate a Bill of this kind. The Board of Trade, the Local Government Board, and the Select Committee could hardly gather enough information; how, then, could such a duty be satisfactorily undertaken by a private Member? He ventured to submit to the House that the whole of the information desirable in dealing with such a subject was not before them. There were just one or two other matters worth attention. There seemed to be an attempt in the Bill to change the present law in reference to standing engines and factories being required to consume their own smoke. These locomotives were not to be so required, and persons who went through the streets of our manufacturing towns, or even went down the Embankment now, and remembered the feeling of having his head only a little lower than the fumes from the chimneys, would have a slight experience of what would be the state of things if these engines in the streets, at all hours, by day and night, were puffing their smoke over passers by. It might be said this was putting the matter too broadly, and that there would only be an engine here and there. But they all knew that the development of trade since 1861 taught a different lesson, and it was impossible to say what the end of this seeming small beginning might be. There was another matter in the Bill which required to be looked after. He had no objection to the red flag, and saw no difficulty a man carrying a red flag would have in using both hands on an emergency; but there was no doubt the attempt made in the Bill to substitute something else for the flag was simply useless. It had been said that the red flag now often became a coloured rag on a little stick; but here it was proposed to have a red band on the hat of a man walking somewhere in the same street with the engine, and on the band in white letters the word "Locomotive." Surely this was mere playing. If there should be a man to precede the engine, he must be distinguished in such a way that he was at once known among a crowd. If not, what was the use of having a man so engaged? With reference to the distinction made between the towns in Scotland and those in England, he thought that at least the application of the Bill should be to Scotch towns not less in number of population, but rather the other way. Whether the Bill was to apply to Ireland he did not know; but he could not see that the measure was adequate to the requirement of the case. Looking to the whole of the circumstances, and anxious as he was at all times—and speaking more especially for the district he represented—that there should be no unreasonable attempt made to restrict trade and limit traffic, he trusted that the Bill would be withdrawn, in the hope that when the necessities and requirements of the case were brought to bear upon the Administration the Government would take on themselves either to introduce a new Bill or one having for its object a consolidation of the old measures. While anxious that this subject should be well ventilated, he was extremely desirous that the responsibility should be on the shoulders of the Government.

Mr. C. H. WILSON thought a great many of the objections to the Bill would be removed if power were given to the local authorities not only to regulate the traffic, but to prohibit entirely the use of these traction engines where it was evident that the disadvantages would be much greater than the advantages. It would be well also if the same power of regulating the traffic were given to the Local Boards of Health in the rural districts as to the Town Councils in the towns. In his opinion, the use of these locomotives would result in many cases in driving private carriage traffic off the roads to a great extent—such he could state had been the result in the neighbourhood of Hull. In a great many cases, no doubt, the use of these engines would be productive of economy, but they were liable to abuses, and while they were of benefit to their owners might do much harm to others. At present, the number of these engines was comparatively few, and he would suggest that the Board of Trade should have authority to give certificates as to safety to locomotives to be used on common roads. On the whole he would support the second reading of the Bill.

MR. HENLEY pointed out that the Bill imposed no limit as to the length of the train which might be drawn by the traction engines. If a train consisting of six or seven waggons overtook a loaded waggon on a country road where, as was often the case, there was hardly room for more than two carriages to pass, there might in consequence be a complete block. He thought that, at all events, there should be a regulation in such a case that the loaded waggon should remain stationary till the train passed. Nor was there any provision as to the rate of speed while passing vehicles drawn by horses. It was desirable also that there should be a provision to prevent the trains from using bridges which were not very secure, and to insure the prompt repair of a bridge which might happen to be damaged. In the district where he lived, and where there were many small bridges over brooks, this was a matter of considerable importance; for by an accident of this kind, a whole district might be put to inconvenience by the destruction of their means of communication.

MR. BEACH said, the Bill had not been sufficiently circulated in the country to allow of its provisions being properly considered. Steam engines were now indispensable for agricultural work, and therefore it was extremely important that there should be some legislative regulations for their use. The two points dealt with in the Bill were the danger to the general public and the hindrance of road traffic. With regard to danger, he thought that had been much exaggerated, as horses were now generally accustomed to these engines; and the red flag was only a signal to those approaching, and was not waved as they passed by. As to the danger of bridges, to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire had referred, there already existed a provision that if a notice was put up that a bridge was not safe for a traction engine to pass over, it would not be allowed to do so. The great fault of the Bill was its inadequacy to meet the damage done to roads by locomotives. The day of tolls was rapidly growing to a close, and therefore tolls would be an inadequate provision. He was of opinion that the case would be better met by a system of licences, the produce of which should be placed at the disposal of the local authorities for the maintenance of the roads, and if the area of highway districts were increased, it would be easy to pay the amount to the proper local authorities. The damage done to roads depended much on the season of the year; and as steam engines had now come into general use for farming purposes, it would be extremely detrimental if any undue restriction were placed on the use of them. The matter, however, ought to be in the hands of Government, and not of a private Member. The hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Chaplin) might be very well satisfied with the discussion that had taken place, and he (Mr. Beach) trusted the Government would bring in next Session a measure which, while it effectually provided for the safety of the public, would rather promote than discourage the use of locomotives, which every day were becoming more and more essential to agriculture.

MR. SAMUELSON said, he agreed with those who thought it would have been well if legislation on this subject had been brought in by Government. Considering the difficulties that the occupiers of land had to deal with, that the acreage under wheat was now 20 per cent less than formerly, and that heavy-soil farms were a drug in the market, and were continually being thrown upon their landlords, it was obvious that no unnecessary obstacle should be placed in the way of any machinery which would facilitate agricultural operations. At the same time, the interests of the public ought to receive the fullest consideration, and due provision should be made that these engines should be used and not abused. In many respects this Bill was a great improvement upon the present law, and particularly with regard to the consumption of smoke. It was impossible to avoid a little smoke when fuel was first put on the fires; but magistrates were now in the invidious position of being obliged to convict although the nuisance was unavoidable. The Bill proposed a more reasonable regulation. Something had been said of giving more power to local authorities to stop the employment of locomotives. It would be most disastrous if local authorities had any such power. Local authorities should be fully empowered to do those things of which they were the best judges; but if they had power to stop the traffic of a county, or stifle improvements, great mischief would be the result. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Local Government Board would give the House some assurance that the Government would take up the question—in which case he hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would be content with the second reading, without going further with his Bill.

MR. PELL hoped the House would not challenge the second reading of the Bill, the object of which was simply to remove certain objectionable features in the existing law. The Bill itself seemed a reasonable one, not at all in excess of the requirements of the time or of the matters it dealt with, and was in strict conformity with the Report of the Committee of 1873, which sat expressly to consider this subject. He did not believe that these locomotives were so dangerous to the public or so injurious to the roads as some asserted. It would be most unwise to drive agricultural engines off the roads, inasmuch as their employment was attended with great advantage, and the cost of maintaining the roads they passed over fell chiefly upon the very persons who used them. The case of traction engines, which were constructed for hauling great weights over roads not constructed for such traffic, occupied a different position; but as they were valuable in some kinds of work, it would not do to prevent their use. He doubted whether, having regard to the expenses they involved and the damage they inflicted upon the highways, they effected any saving at all. If they continued in use, it was only because their owners paid nothing towards the maintenance of the roads. He thought a contribution for this purpose might fairly be exacted from those persons, and that some restriction ought to be placed upon the use of traction engines, by means of licences or tolls. He hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would not go to a division; but if he did, he should vote for the second reading.

MR. D. DAVIES said, he saw no objection to the use of traction engines on roads provided they did not exceed a reasonable weight, and that they were properly constructed. In his opinion, the roads were, as a rule, improved rather than cut up by the pressure upon them of traction engines—in that respect, he thought the fears of hon. Members unnecessary. There was certainly some difficulty as to the passing of traction engines by other vehicles—especially where the roads were narrow—because it would sometimes happen that the engines could only travel in the middle of the road; but this difficulty could be obviated. He further admitted that horses were often frightened by them; but speaking from experience he declared that by degrees animals got quite accustomed to the engines and were not at all disturbed by them. In short, he knew no difficulties connected with the use of these engines that could not be overcome.

COLONEL BRISE was in favour of facilitating, as far as possible, the use of locomotives, but he was afraid that at present the roads were not in a sufficiently favourable condition to sustain the great weight of the engines—certainly that was so in the district with which he was acquainted. His great difficulty in connection with the Bill was that great trouble would be experienced in getting the owners and users of these engines to contribute towards the maintenance of the roads. He believed that the only way in which this difficulty could properly be met would be by compelling the owners of such machines to take out licences for their use—but then in what way was the money to be distributed? He thought there were several matters in the Bill deserving of consideration; but he hoped the hon. and gallant Member would not proceed further with it this Session.

MR. EVANS agreed with hon. Gentlemen who had spoken, that the subject should be taken up and dealt with by the Government. He thought the Local Government Board was competent to deal with the question and form adequate regulations to govern the use of locomotives. He held it was inadvisable for the Government to be going on year after year passing, as it were, an Act of indemnity in connection with these engines. He suggested that much of the difficulty might be met if some plan were devised by means of which owners of engines might be made to contribute towards the maintenance of the roads.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he did not think that a very strong case had been made out in favour of giving the Bill a second reading. Much more time would be required to make it a thoroughly useful and practical measure than the House had at its disposal this Session. At the same time, he admitted that his hon. and gallant Friend had done good service in drawing attention to the subject. A great deal had been said respecting the imperfections of the law; but they were not so very numerous as to demand attention until they could be grappled with effectually. There were several important omissions from the Bill as it was drawn. Some specific enactment, for instance, ought to have been included with reference to the weight of the engines. The Government had no desire unduly or vexatiously to limit the use of road locomotives. On the contrary, they desired to do what was judicious in this matter. But the difficulty was to hold the balance even. The interests of inventors and agriculturists required that no unnecessary impediment should be placed to their use: but the interests of the public were not identical with those of the owners and farmers, and demanded that nothing should be done which would interfere with the free use of the Queen's highway. The interests of the ratepayers had also to be considered. The Bill under consideration was defective in many respects. Such a Bill ought certainly to lay down regulations with respect to the weight of the engines, the construction of the wheels, and the hours during which the locomotives should be allowed to ply upon the roads. His opinion was that some reasonable compromise ought to be sought for in the matter. Supposing the Government made concessions to the owners of the locomotives, the latter ought to submit to further regulations than those to which they were now subject. These and other matters involved could no doubt be dealt with by regulations made by a competent authority; but at present there was no uniform road authority throughout the Kingdom. He recognized the fact that some contribution towards the maintenance of the roads should be made by the proprietors of engines. With respect to the question of whether the Government should not take up the matter and deal with it, he would explain that the debate now proceeding had not been necessary to direct his attention to it—he could assure his hon. and gallant Friend that he had given this subject a great deal of consideration. He had hoped to introduce a Bill this Session to consolidate the Acts of 1861 and 1865 which dealt with road locomotives, and a measure had been actually prepared for that purpose; but he felt that it was necessary that any Bill dealing with road locomotives should follow another Bill dealing with the highways and establishing a uniform road authority; and as he saw no prospect of such a Bill becoming law this Session he had not introduced it. If there had been a reasonable probability of obtaining sufficient time for a full discussion of the details of the Bill he should be glad to avail himself of his hon. and gallant Friend's aid in legislating on this subject; but considering the period of the Session and the serious omissions from the Bill, he could not think any useful purpose could be served by reading it a second time.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN would vote for the second reading of the Bill. Speaking from personal experience, he could say that in the county of Kent traction engines were nearly as common as carriers' carts, and while useful to the agriculturists they did not do any serious injury to the roads. In Warwickshire, with which he was also connected, there were very few of these engines, and their want was greatly felt in those districts where the farmers had few facilities for delivering their produce. There were parts of the country in which thousands of acres of land remained unlet because there were no means of taking the produce to market, and the introduction of locomotive engines on the turnpike roads would tend greatly to the advantage of those places. There were certain points on which regulations would be necessary; but these were points of detail which could be arranged without difficulty. The regulation of the hours during which the engines were to be permitted was an important point; but it would be unreasonable to restrict the rate of speed to four miles an hour.

MR. VERNER feared that the effect of certain clauses would be that the roads would be taken out of the hands of the surveyors and be put under irresponsible persons. If this was intended he greatly objected to it, as he found that the Bill was to be extended to Ireland. He felt confident that the roads in the North of Ireland were not such as could be used by traction engines;—from the geological formation of the country, and certain peculiarities in the traffic, the roads would be fearfully cut up. The evidence given before the Committee confirmed this view.

COLONEL BERESFORD opposed the Bill on account of the dangers attending the employment of locomotives on the public highways. Such accidents were of frequent occurrence, and he thought the subject ought to be taken up by the President of the Board of Trade.

MR. MARK STEWART said, he knew very little about the Bill before it was now proposed for the second reading; but, after looking through it, he thought everyone must arrive at the conclusion that the Bill, as it now stood, was most unsatisfactory. He would not oppose the measure if he really did not think it a bad one—but there were so many omissions that he did not see how it could be satisfactorily amended in Committee. In respect of Scotland, he thought that, since the House would probably be engaged to-morrow on a Bill for the abolition of tolls in Scotland, it was very unreasonable to discuss the present Bill so far as it was applicable to that country. He had known considerable damage to be done by traction engines. He drew a very large distinction between the engines which were used for agricultural purposes and those which were used by traders in pursuit of gain, or were used in the construction of public works. Whilst agreeing with the principle that traction engines might be used under proper regulations—and, in fact, were found to be so valuable an adjunct to husbandry that farmers in many districts could not do without them—he maintained that this Bill would be of no practical use.

MR. STORER said, that the Bill had been anxiously looked for by the agricultural classes. It should be remembered that all the objections raised to locomotives had been originally used against railways. The Bill might, perhaps, be improved in Committee, but it ought to be read a second time. The great argument in its favour was that heavy land could not be cultivated without steam, and in many parts of the country where heavy weights had to be moved, the use of traction engines had become almost indispensable.

MR. LEIGHTON regretted that the Government had not clearly stated the course they intended to take with regard to this Bill. For his own part, he considered the Bill bad in principle, inopportune in time, and one-sided in detail. The question was really a financial one, yet the financial points had been omitted from the discussion. There was no insuperable objection to locomotives being used on common roads if their owners paid a sum towards the repairs adequate to the damage they caused. The Preamble declared that experience proved that the use of locomotives was not injurious to roads. His own experience proved exactly the contrary. He knew a road which formerly cost £23 a-mile, and now, since a locomotive had been placed upon it, was costing £119 a-mile. He knew another road, under similar circumstances, which formerly cost £35 a-mile, and was now costing between £300 and £400. He would not press too far the argument based on the danger of these engines to life and limb, though no one could doubt that they were dangerous. The mode of exacting a proper contribution towards the repairs of the roads from the owners of locomotives was a simple one. There could be no very great difficulty in creating a system of licences to be granted by the road authority, whatever that authority might be. But in the Bill there was no attempt to provide any machinery of that sort. The importance of the whole question was enormously increased by the gradual discontinuance of turnpikes. There was one unanimous opinion expressed from all sides of the House in which he joined, and that was that the Government should without delay legislate on the whole subject of roads in a comprehensive spirit.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON remarked that a Highway Bill had been promised from year to year, but always postponed; and he hoped that in dealing with this measure his right hon. Friend would not make one Bill wait for the other. The time had come for the use of locomotives, and engineers could easily overcome mechanical difficulties.

MR. GREENE approved of the principle of the Bill as a measure of protection, but he thought the subject was one which ought to be taken up by the Government as a whole, and the use of locomotives on roads be included in general legislation for highways. There was no doubt that these engines injured the roads to some extent. With regard to horses, what frightened them was the sight of things they were not accustomed to, and he would suggest that if the drivers of locomotives were to put in front of the engine two of those grey horses which were to be seen outside harness makers' shops he believed the real horses would be perfectly satisfied. There were other things besides engines which frightened horses—bicycles, for example; and he spoke feelingly on the matter, for his son had sustained a serious injury owing to his horses having been frightened by a bicycle.

COLONEL CHAPLIN said, that in consequence of the statement of his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board he would withdraw the Bill.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 51.]

(Mr. Sharman Crawford, Mr. R. Smyth, Mr. Dickson, Mr. D. Taylor.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SHARMAN CRAWFORD, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that he was not aware of any question which opened up such a wide field for consideration. The Bill had been previously submitted to the House by him, and it was consequently not now necessary to trouble the House again at any length, if it were not that it had undergone some modifications and additions which it would be needful to describe. The Bill now consisted of two parts. The first dealt with the Ulster tenant-right custom. The second part of the Bill, which was not formerly included in it, endeavoured to extend tenant-right to the whole country, and not alone the North of Ireland. He did not intend to advance any new principles of law with regard to the Ulster tenant-right custom. He proposed simply to legalize a right which had existed for a great number of years, and to carry out more effectually what, he believed, was intended to be done by the 1st clause of the Land Act of 1870. In the Bill, it was taken for granted that tenant-right existed in all holdings in Ulster; and a reference to early records would show that tenant-right was universal in Ulster, and that it was only at intervals that it had been destroyed in particular districts. In order, however, to establish this, there was a difficulty in carrying out the Act of 1870. A tenant had at present a difficulty in establishing his rights in a Court of Law, not because the tenant-right did not exist, but because the onus of proof that it did exist was thrown upon him by the law as it now stood, and because, however much he might be entitled to tenant-right, it might be impossible for him to prove it by evidence which was regarded as admissible or conclusive in a Court of Law. This was more especially the case in regard to the larger and important class of leasehold tenants. It was to obviate this difficulty, and render tenant-right more secure, that the Bill proposed that the onus of proof should be transferred from the tenant to the landlord—that it should be for the latter to prove the land was not subject to tenant-right. Then the Bill provided that a surrender should not destroy the existence of tenant-right. And as there had been many cases in which the rights of tenants had been nominally purchased up, the Bill would provide that no sales should be valid unless it was for a valuable consideration. Then the Bill would give the right of free sale by the tenant of his interest in the land, and that was a provision that had been the most called into question of any of the Bill; but he (Mr. Crawford) held that that privilege was an essential portion of the original Ulster tenant-right, that it was necessary to give security of tenure, and that it was the confidence it had inspired that had made Ulster the most improved part of Ireland. So far the Bill was the same as last year. But, besides that, the Bill contained some provisions applicable to the rest of Ireland. They thought it hard that a mere change of a few pounds on the rental of premises should, as was the case at present, deprive a tenant not only of his tenant-right, but of any claim to compensation under the Land Act. A case in which this had been held showed the necessity of some amendment in the Land Act in order to obviate the occurrence of similar cases in future. Then, in order to facilitate the settlement of the amount of rent as between landlord and tenant, the Bill contained certain provisions for the amendment of the law. At present when a landlord and tenant differed as to the amount of rent, the only way to bring about a settlement of the question was for the landlord to give the tenant notice to quit. This led to heart-burning and contention, and frequently to legal proceedings. Clauses were, therefore, introduced into the Bill which would enable differences as to rent to be settled without going to law, and without any interruption of the friendly feelings which had subsisted, and which it was desirable should subsist, between landlords and tenants. Then he had tried to extend the Bright clauses of the Act of 1870, which were now the subject of inquiry by a Committee upstairs; and with a view to make them more generally available, he proposed that the amount of public money which might be advanced to the tenants to enable them to purchase their holdings should be raised from two-thirds to three-fourths of the value. He felt that this was a question of the utmost importance. It had excited the greatest attention in Ireland, and its settlement was looked forward to with the greatest anxiety both in the North and South of that country. The London Standard had recently expressed its approval of the first and second parts of the hon. and learned Member's (Mr. Butt's) Bill, the former of which proposed to extend the Ulster tenant-right to the whole of Ireland. He (Mr. Crawford) could not give a better description of the purposes of the Bill, the second reading of which he was then moving, than in the words of that paper—

“ Mr. Butt's Bill is divided into three parts, the first of which proposes to enlarge the Ulster custom to the whole of Ireland. Thus, the two first parts of the Bill have for their object the amendment of the Act of 1870. As regards the former object there can be no doubt that sooner or later it will be attained. If the Ulster custom is good for one province it cannot be bad for the other three. And everyone will admit that the intention of the Legislature should not be allowed to be defeated by mere defect of language. It has been ruled, for example, that if a tenant surrenders his holding to obtain a lease he thereby forfeits his right to compensation for improvements. It is certain that this was not the intention of Parliament, and it is obvious that the ruling must operate against leases, which it ought to be our endeavour to encourage.”

Questions regarding tenant-right might be difficult of discussion by Englishmen who did not know what the Ulster custom was. Nor was it, perhaps, strange that those who were not acquainted with the facts should view with alarm the proposal to give Irish tenants privileges not possessed by English tenants. But it must be recollected that there was a great difference between Irish and English tenants. In England the improvement of the farms was almost always done by the landlords, while in Ireland they were usually done by the tenants. The Irish tenant had, therefore, a right to expect greater security of tenure than the English tenant, and if they were given this security they would be more inclined to invest their capital in the land. There was no better way of giving that security than by establishing tenant-right, coupled with the right of free sale. In no part of Ireland where tenant-right did not exist had there been any great improvement. He did not accuse the landlords of Ireland, as a rule, with being bad landlords. Many of them were good landlords, and the principles of tenant-right were ordinarily observed in the North; but that was not always the case with new landlords, and the consequence was, that while many estates did not now require the application of the present Bill there was no security that it might not be wanted on a change of proprietorship. If they looked back half-a-century they would find that legislation was even then going on as to this question between landlord and tenant, and legislation must still go on till the tenant had obtained such adequate security as was proposed by the Bill. It might be said that there had been no Petitions in its favour. But he could point to meetings supporting it from month to month, and even when meetings had been held to oppose it, it was a curious fact that hardly a word was said against its principles. The interest which Ulster took in this question had been shown at the last Election, and would be shown still more at any future Election. When he proposed this legislation in favour of the Ulster tenant he believed that he was standing on a ~~glorious~~ form on which the landlord and tenant question might be settled for a long period to come, if not for ever, and that, too, on the best terms. This legislation would, in his opinion, lead to better feeling between landlord and tenant, and give to the latter that security without which no man could be expected to invest his capital in land, and he contended that the Bill was founded on the principles of right and justice; and he was conscientiously convinced that it would do more to settle the question between landlord and tenant in Ireland than any other which could be proposed. As that was his impression, he confidently asked the House to assent to the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the second time."—(Mr. Sharman Crawford.)

MR. PLUNKET, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said, having so often before resisted various violent proposals as to the Irish Land Question, he appeared before the House again on the subject with great reluctance; but the hon. Member for Down (Mr. Sharman Crawford) left him no other course. He deplored the agitation which was kept up on the question, and that the settlement of 1870 was not left to bear fruit. Those who instigated these Bills constantly stirred up ill feelings on the part of tenants by dangling before them hopes of what they never could or ought to get; at the same time, denouncing the great advantages which were conferred on the tenants by the Act of 1870, representing it as a failure and contending that the fundamental principles of that measure should be changed. Then, when the House of Commons, after full debate, felt itself bound to reject these Bills by large majorities, not composed of members of one, but of both sides of the House, still the agitation was continued. Class was set against class, tenant against landlord, and the repudiation of existing laws as land-tenure was carried so far as to weaken the confidence of the people in that House, which it was desirable should be entertained by all subjects of Her Majesty, and especially in Ireland. He did not, however, believe that any feeling of that kind would be successfully stirred up or permanently maintained in Ulster. He believed that this tenant-right agitation was beginning to break up. Men like his hon. Friend who proposed reforms short of the most violent alterations were being quickly left behind in the race. Even in the North this Bill, with all the violent clauses it contained, was denounced as quite inadequate by the more reckless agitators. He did not deny that the Bill was not so extreme in its principles, or so violent in its proposals as some of those which had been laid before the House by other hon. Members; but if any check had been given to these visionary demands, he traced that circumstance to the fact that they had last year been rejected by large majorities in that House, composed not of one Party exclusively, but, as he had already said, of hon. Members sitting on each side of the House. The Bill of this year was, in its most important aspects, almost identical with that of last year and the year before. It must, therefore, be with the indulgence of the House that he should try their patience by travelling over the same ground. As had been well said by the hon. Member for Down they could not go much into detail without getting out of Order; but many of the details of this Bill were not germane to main principles. Part of the proposal dealt with the Bright clauses of the Irish Land Act of 1870, and those clauses being submitted to the consideration of a Committee upstairs, this was not the time to discuss them; but this he would say in passing, as this was a Tenant Right Bill which must concern Ulster, that every Member from Ulster upon the Committee, or who had supported the appointment of the Committee, was as anxious as any hon. Member who supported the introduction of this measure, that every facility should be given, and by the best machinery that could be devised, for the carrying out of the policy of those clauses in the Act of 1870. In the first place he would refer to the 7th clause in relation to contracts. That clause provided that after the passing of the Act, no contract should be valid for the acquisition by the landlord from the tenant of the tenant-right custom, unless the contract should be in writing, signed by the tenant, and made for a valuable consideration. That clause, so far as it dealt with tenant-right, and so far as he was able to form an opinion of it, he did not think a mischievous or injurious one. As regarded the general question of tenant-right at the end of a lease, he stated clearly, as far as he was concerned, and he might say the same of every Conservative Member coming from Ulster, they were as desirous as any men could be that the question should be set at rest speedily and finally, and he would take the opportunity of observing that this would now have been done by the law, if it had not been for the hon. Member who introduced the Bill now before the House. He (Mr. Crawford) opposed the Bill brought in last year by the hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland). That hon. Gentleman was not now present, and he (Mr. Plunket) felt sure every hon. Member deplored the cause of his absence; but in his absence, he would say that the proposal then made had the assent not only of the Members from Ulster, whose names were on the back of the Bill, but of many, if not all, the other Ulster Members. That Bill differed in some comparatively unimportant respects from the corresponding clauses of the Bill now before the House; but it proposed to carry out the principle, and it was opposed by the hon. Member who now urged his Bill in the interest of the tenant-farmers of Ulster. In dealing with the Bill, his Opposition took much the same ground as it did two years since, when the question was fully debated and afterwards voted on by the House. He might be excused, however, if he referred to the circumstances under which the Ulster claims were passed into the Land Act of 1870. Although his hon. Friend did not charge all the Ulster landlords with being bad landlords, and was good enough to grant a few exceptions as not being utterly bad, still he did imply that strong and new legislation was necessary to keep the landlords of Ulster straight. It was right to remind the House of the circumstances under which the clauses of the 1870 Act, as far as regarded Ulster, were passed. [Cries of "Divide!"] He was speaking strictly to the Bill, explaining it, and he held it was an important subject, and he should be allowed to proceed. As regarded the clause dealing with the sale of holdings by the tenant, either by auction or contract, he could not imagine anything which would be more detrimental both to the interests of tenants, as well as landlords, than that a landlord should not be allowed to exercise a control in the selection of a tenant. The clause provided that a landlord must have a "reasonable objection," but how was the reasonable objection to be determined? The landlord might suspect the proposed tenant of being a seditious character, or he might be a drunkard, or there might be many objections sufficiently reasonable to the landlord; but, according to the Bill, unless he was prepared to put down his objections to the man in black and white he had no right to take exception to him. Could such a provision be in the interest of tenants themselves? Had it not been one of the advantages of the Ulster custom that the landlord selected the incoming tenant from the adjoining tenantry, from among those with whom he was accustomed to live in harmony and peace? Clause 6 gave the tenant an absolute right to sell his holding by auction, and that was one of the most monstrous proposals that could be made. In the reasons given for the Bill the hon. Member for Down had only adduced a single case of hardship or abuse under the Ulster custom, and even now at the end of three years he had not mentioned the name.

MR. SHARMAN CRAWFORD: I beg pardon. The names are at the service of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. PLUNKET said, that even though the hon. Member was able to give a few names, he would hardly contend that that would be sufficient justification for such a change in the law as was proposed by the Bill. He had a full recollection of the circumstances under which the Land Act had been passed, and he also remembered the Coercion Acts which were also carried, because they were found to be necessary at that time. There were, he said, circumstances connected with the Administration of that period which rendered the coercion laws that were passed necessary; they had hoped that while those penal measures would have been but temporary, the large concessions of the Land Act would have remained permanent and undisturbed. He rejoiced to think that half this happy forecast was being fast fulfilled, and that coercion and its causes were fading out in Ireland. And now he put it to the House whether it was wise that they should be constantly agitating this land question? If the tenants of Ireland were to be constantly told that they were oppressed, would there be any likelihood of their settling down in contentment? The tenantry of Ulster were well off as undoubtedly they deserved to be; but their position was grounded on other conditions besides the Land Act of 1870. It was grounded on the good relations existing, and which had for centuries existed, between landlord and tenant in that part of Ireland. He knew that the hon. Member for Down denied that; but he contended that, nevertheless, it was a fact. He hoped the present Government would resist any attempt to alter the spirit of the Act of 1870, and would not allow this Bill to become law. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the rejection of the Bill.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that as an English Member he had a right to address the House on this subject. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER asked if the hon. Member proposed to second the Motion.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he did. As an English Member he was entitled to say something. He felt that the Act of 1870 was a fair settlement—[Loud cries of "Divide!"] The hon. Member proceeded to address the House, but was quite inaudible owing to the noise.

DR. BRADY: Mr. Speaker, I rise to Order. It appears to me we came here to discuss this Bill fully and perfectly out to the end. This has been done to a large extent by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Plunket); but now the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) rises to tide over the few minutes which remain, with the clear object of preventing the division which we all desire to see being taken. [An hon. MEMBER: He is talking it out.] I should like to have your opinion, Sir, on the point.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) is in possession of the House. He has done nothing that is out of Order.

MR. GOLDNEY continued, when—

REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Report brought up.

MR. SPEAKER: The Question is, that it be an Instruction to the Select Committee on the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill that they have power to introduce provisions into the said Bill to regulate the supervision of refreshment houses in Ireland, and to increase the penalties for the illicit sale of intoxicating liquors in Ireland.

MR. O'SULLIVAN: I oppose the passage of this Motion, Sir. I think that this is rather too important a question to be dismissed in a moment. It deals not only with Sunday closing but with the traffic on the other days of the week. It also deals with the supervision by the police in a manner which would not be tolerated for a second in this country.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I rise to Order. If the hon. Member opposes the Motion, I apprehend that will settle it to-day.

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member oppose the Motion?

MR. O'SULLIVAN: I do, Sir; I object to it being taken now.

MR. SPEAKER said, the Motion would stand adjourned until to-morrow.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Sir, with your permission, I should like to make an announcement to the House which the House may feel interested in hearing. In accordance with the advice given me by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) the other night I have considered whether I should be justified in giving up Wednesday next, June 27th, in order to make way for the consideration of this Bill, so that its passing may be facilitated this Session. My only object has been to secure facilities for the Bill; and, on consultation with hon. Members on both sides of the House, I find that there is a general impression that the offer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer meets the necessities of the case. I, therefore, accept the offer of the right hon. Gentleman in the spirit in which it was made, and I fully accede to the arrangement he proposed.

BURIAL ACTS CONSOLIDATION BILL.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: My Lords, at the close of the discussion on the Burials Bill, last Monday evening, I asked your Lordships to adjourn the further consideration of the Report, in consequence of the result of the division which had just been taken on the Amendment moved by the noble Earl (the Earl of Harrowby). I did so, as I then stated, in order that I might have an opportunity of consulting my Colleagues as to the course which should be adopted with regard to the Bill. My Lords, since that time I have had the opportunity of consulting them. We have given the subject our most deliberate and earnest attention, and we have come to the conclusion that the Amendment of the noble Earl is so opposed to the general scheme of the Bill, and would so entirely disarrange the principle on which it is founded, that it is incumbent on us to withdraw the measure. During the Recess we shall give the whole subject our attentive consideration; but we cannot proceed with the present measure. We have thought it respectful to your Lordships that, the Government having come to that conclusion, you should have the earliest intimation of it. On Monday next, when the adjourned Order for the reception of the Report comes before the House, I shall move that it be discharged, and I shall then withdraw the Bill.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I have heard with great regret the statement which the noble Duke has just made to your Lordships. The Burials Bill was not introduced hastily. It was not mentioned in the Queen's Speech, but was introduced on the 13th of March. Since that time the Government have had repeated opportunities of learning the sentiments of the House with regard to the provisions contained in the Bill itself and the Amendments which have been proposed. No doubt the subject will receive the consideration which the noble Duke promises during the Recess, and I venture to express a hope that he will next Session introduce a measure in which regard will be had to the opinion which has been expressed in the strongest possible manner by your Lordships' House. It is, I think, greatly to be regretted that a question which both sides of the House have thought desirable should be settled this Session, should be thrown over to another year, and thus for several months be made a subject of all sorts of hostility between those members of the Church who adhere to the existing state of things, and those other members of the Church who think that it ought to be changed in conformity with the Amendment of the noble Earl, and who are supported in that view by a large body of Nonconformists. I repeat that I think it a matter of very deep regret that the Government have not taken upon themselves, after the opinion expressed by the House, the duty of settling the question during the present Session.

METROPOLITAN STREET IMPROVEMENTS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that this Bill had been introduced by the Metropolitan Board of Works for the purpose of taking the necessary authority for constructing a new street from Bethnal Green to Holborn, by which communication would be completely open to Regent Street; and another new street from Tottenham Court Road to Trafalgar Square. These, no doubt, were very important improvements; but while they were thus improving the metropolis in one direction, they should be careful that they did not inflict injury in another, and he desired to call the attention of their Lordships to the fact that the measure would displace a large number of the working classes from their present dwellings without providing adequate accommodation for them when turned out of the homes which they now occupied. He had had carefully prepared statistics furnished to him on this subject, and those statistics did not at all agree with the figures which had been given by the Metropolitan Board of Works. The statement deposited by the Promoters of the Bill, under Standing Order 38, gave as the number of houses occupied by persons of the labouring classes, and as the number of persons of those classes to be displaced, these statistics:—For West-end improvement—houses, 147; number of persons displaced, 1,753. For Gray's Inn Road improvement—houses, 215; number of persons displaced, 2,166. A house-to-house inquiry, recently made, showed that those figures were altogether inaccurate, and that, in fact, they should stand—For West-end improvement—houses, 446; number of persons displaced, 7,077. For Gray's Inn Road improvement—number of houses, 332; number of persons displaced, 3,781. This showed an error in the statement as to those two improvements of 416 houses and 6,939 persons. And instead of 19 streets being dealt with under the Bill, 38 would be affected. These figures disclosed a grave discrepancy; and showed, in his opinion, that some further inquiry was absolutely necessary. He did not impute to the Metropolitan Board of Works any mala fides in connection with their statistics; but he thought it must be evident that some extraordinary blunder had been committed in their preparation.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN pointed out that in the Bill before their Lordships there was no account of the sum which the ratepayers would have to pay for the improvements to be undertaken.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, that the account referred to by the noble Earl would be found in a Loan Bill which the Metropolitan Board of Works had at present before the other House of Parliament. No doubt it was a duty incumbent on the Board to see that while they were effecting great improvements in communications of the Metropolis, they did not inflict injury on the persons whom these improvements affected. The statistics deposited with the Bill might not be perfectly accurate, but he thought the Promoters had complied sufficiently with the Standing Order to enable the Secretary of State to see that provision was made for the displaced persons. The Standing Order was framed with the object of securing that no serious injury should be done to the working classes, and for this purpose it made it obligatory on the Promoters to prove to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State that adequate provision was made before any demolition to the extent of 15 houses was undertaken. If, however, the Committee, before which the Bill must go in the ordinary course, should be of opinion that additional provision for the displaced persons was required, the Metropolitan Board would be willing to have it secured by a clause in the Bill itself. He hoped, therefore, that their Lordships would not defer the second reading. He might add, {that a Bill was under consideration for supplementing the provisions of the existing law.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE pointed out that there was a difference between the offering of a site for houses for the labouring classes and providing houses for them. In a case which occurred four or five years ago, the Metropolitan Board appeared to think that they had complied with the Standing Orders by offering a site; but the site up to this moment had not been built upon.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON reminded their Lordships that, unlike the persons opposing an ordinary Private Bill, the persons who would be displaced by this Bill were not in a position to have themselves represented by counsel before the Select Committee on the Bill. And it appeared that no fewer than 250 houses and 2,000 population had been omitted from the statement of the Promoters.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE, while thinking that the Promoters had not very closely adhered to the Standing Order, was of opinion that the displaced persons would be sufficiently protected under that Order.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly.

(1870) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 74.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD COLERIDGE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that while the measure dealt with serious and important questions, and proposed serious and important alterations in the existing law, it attempted to make those alterations in accordance with the ancient principles of the law of England, and proceeded on lines already laid down. He did not seek to deny that in some families the measure would materially affect the family relations; but it would do so only in cases in which, if they were individually considered, all would admit that those relations sorely needed alteration. No one suggested that, if the Bill came into operation, it would come into operation in anything like a large number of cases; but the fact that the injustice and wrong which it sought to remove did not extensively exist was no argument against a reform which in some cases was very much required. The Act of 1870 was carried through Parliament from the general sense that existed both in this and the other House of Parliament, that the then existing state of the law worked a great and unmistakeable injustice towards married women. The Act did not leave their Lordships' House in the same state in which it entered it; but much as he regretted the alterations their Lordships had felt it their duty to make in the Bill, he felt, and always had felt, that all interested in the question owed a deep and lasting obligation to his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack for the improvement in the condition of hundreds and thousands of married women effected by that Act. Experience had now shown that the Act of 1870 was a wise and useful measure; and he thought the time had now come when Parliament might be safely asked to make further concessions—and chiefly in the direction of the existing Act. That Act contained two sets of kindred clauses. It gave absolute protection for the personal earnings of married women, and absolute protection for property to which married women might succeed in law up to the amount of £200. It contained a number of clauses by which the position of married women was greatly improved, and it afforded other relief under certain conditions; but it declined to say that which was law for the husband in respect of the contract of marriage was law for the wife also. Rights which would be a husband's by the ordinary operation of law, without any action on his part, were granted to a wife by the Act of 1870, only on her having adopted certain conditions precedent. Now, no one who knew what women were—or, indeed, people generally, would be inclined to think that such conditions were in themselves no slight drawback in the privileges conferred by the Act. He said, therefore, that the Act which was passed in 1870 for the protection of the property of married women, and amended by the Act of 1874, was a just and beneficial legislation—it conferred a substantial boon on married women, and was a great improvement on the law, but it did not go far enough. The Bill now before their Lordships, and of which he was now about to move the second reading was, with scarcely the alteration of a single syllable, the same as that which left the Select Committee of the House of Commons in the year 1873—a Committee chosen without the slightest reference of Party, and consisting of eminent persons. He now submitted the Bill to their Lordships in that shape, because, considering the authority of such a Committee, they might safely approve of the principle of the measure without any apprehension of serious opposition arising in the other House. Another reason why he asked their Lordships to pass it, was that he believed the alteration of the law which it proposed, not only was according to sound and just principles, but was in accordance with the ancient law of this country. In old days a great protection was thrown around a married woman in respect of her landed property. It was true that, by the right of control which the husband had over his wife, he could possess himself of the rents and profits of such property while they lived together; but he could not take the land and alienate it, for the land was not his, but hers: again, the right of dower in the old days, standing not upon contract, but upon ordinary law, had always seemed to him, as a lawyer, to be a most important testimony from those ancient times to the justice of treating the wife as independently securing certain property for herself by right and by law, and not merely by contract, and a testimony also to her capacity of so holding it. In modern times, however, it had come to be held by a fiction of law that the marriage contract operated as an absolute gift, not only of all that the women possessed at the time of her marriage, but of all that she might thereafter become entitled to by inheritance or otherwise; and her right of dower in her husband's real estate might be barred at his pleasure. What this Bill sought to effect was in substance to enact that by the contract of marriage, under the ordinary operation of the law, the property of a married woman should not be taken from her. Of course, it might be made the subject of settlement, as was the case at present; but, by the ordinary operation of law, a woman on contracting marriage would not lose the right in her property. The Bill scarcely differed in a single provision from that which was recommended by the Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1873. Lord Lyndhurst, in a speech delivered on the second reading of the Divorce Bill, pointed out how hardly the law bore against married women, and in his Life of Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Campbell approved the opinions he then expressed. The present state of the law he (Lord Coleridge) contended, could not in justice be longer maintained. In its harshest features it was peculiar to this country. Not long ago a lady of high rank and most exalted character, but unknown to him, applied to him (Lord Coleridge) to ascertain whether any redress could be afforded by the law of England in the case of a wife who was living with her husband, who, without doing anything which would have made an application to the Divorce Court likely to be successful, was making her life miserable, was plundering her of all the property she possessed, and making anything like a decent living or education of their offspring absolutely impossible. He was obliged to tell the lady that as far as he knew, and could understand the case she had laid before him, it was a hard case, but one for which the law of England gave no redress. It grieved him to read the very just remarks contained in a letter he had lately received. His correspondent said—

“Once in my life I took some trouble in persuading a couple to marry and to legalize a union which had lasted for many years. I am sorry to find that the woman who lives unmarried with a man has legal rights and protection which she loses when she marries.”

That showed the unsatisfactory state of the existing law. But there were other cases illustrative of its condition. There was a case in which certainly no one who heard him could have the slightest sympathy with the woman who was the subject of it; but it was a curious illustration of the law as regarded husband and wife in respect of property. It was the case of a woman who married by advertizement. There was a settlement in the case providing, as the woman thought, that her property was to be secured for herself in case of separation. A separation took place not many years after the marriage ceremony was solemnized, and it was then found that by the settlement every farthing of her property passed away from her. Recourse was had to a Court; and the Vice Chancellor, being of opinion that the settlement had not been drawn up in accordance with the intention of the wife, set aside the settlement, and she got her money. Take a stronger case, which was lately brought before the Court of Appeal, where a woman had been carrying on a considerable and successful business, and had saved money. She was carrying on the business at the time of the marriage. She married an old man without a settlement. In three or four months he died, and by the ordinary operation of the law of England, the whole of her property, stock in trade, and money would have absolutely passed to his creditors, as he died insolvent. The Court of Chancery was able to interfere, on the ground that there had been sufficient permission on the part of the husband, after the marriage, to the wife to continue the business in her own name, and to constitute him a trustee of the wife; and that, therefore, in that particular case, the wife had a right to the business and the stock-in-trade. It might be said these were sensational stories, and that it was unwise to legislate upon such cases. But when such cases were mentioned to him, the first question with himself was, not were these stories sensational, but were they true? If they were true, the state of law under which they took place required amendment. He believed that all the countries of Europe, Turkey not excepted, were before England as regarded the relations of married women to their property. The Continental States had in this matter generally adopted the principles to be found stated in their best form in the well-known Institutes of Justinian. He would not take their Lordships through the Codes of the several nations of Europe in relation to this subject; but he would mention that in Holland, where the control of the husband over his wife's property was greatest, yet the property was hers, not his, and if he mismanaged it, he was held responsible to her through the ordinary tribunals of the country. In the great American Republic, which derived its laws and institutions in a great measure from the parent country, and in some of our Australian Colonies, the law of England, in respect of married women's property, had been widely departed from. He could not do better than read the following extracts from Mr. Russell Gurney's speech on this subject in 1870:—

"We have, however, something better than theory or conjecture to guide us as to the probable effect of the change which I propose. There is, I believe, no civilized country which has adopted the law which has prevailed here. It did, indeed, exist for a time in the United States of America as a part of the English law which the founders of those States carried with them across the Atlantic. But in State after State has it been repealed, and in none have the ill consequences followed which are apprehended by our opponents. . . We had the strongest testimony upon this point from American witnesses. Mr. Dudley Field, of New York, . . . told us that 'scarcely any one of the great reforms which have been effected in this State has given more entire satisfaction than this. Mr. Fisher, from Vermont, said—'I do not believe that I have ever seen an individual in the State who wanted to go back to the old law.' Mr. Washburne, a Professor of Law at Harvard University, said—'I regarded the first inroad upon the Common Law with apprehension that it would cause angry and unkind feeling in families. I am so far convinced of the contrary, that I would not be one to restore that Common Law if I could.' The law has been changed, too, among our own fellow-countrymen in Canada, and Mr. Rose, the Canadian Minister, states—'I have not heard any desire on the part of either men or women to return to the old law.'"

—[3 Hansard, cci. 885.]

He (Lord Coleridge) was supported also in the change which he proposed by high authority on this side of the Atlantic. Some years ago a Commission was appointed to prepare a Code for India. He found in their Report the following recommendation:—

"It has been necessary for us in one or two cases to introduce provisions affecting rights as between living persons. We propose that a man shall not, through the mere operation of law, acquire by marriage any interest in his wife's property during her life; but that she shall continue to possess the same rights with reference to it as if she were unmarried, and shall have full power to dispose of it by will."

That recommendation was signed by Lord Romilly, Sir William Erle, Sir Edward Ryan, Mr. Lowe, and Mr. Justice Willes, and it now formed part of the Code of India. There was only one other authority to which he would refer, and that, all their Lordships would admit, was the highest possible, it being the opinion of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. The Lord Chancellor, in the course of the debate on the second reading of the Married Women's Property Bill, in the House of Lords, on the 21st of June, 1870, said—

"Our law differed in this respect from that of most other countries. In all Continental countries, to a greater or less extent, laws had been adopted more favourable to married women; and if we looked to those great communities across the Atlantic that had sprung from ourselves—the United States and Canada—it would be found that they had abrogated our Common Law in this matter, and had adopted legislation similar to, or in the direction of, the present Bill. . . . The third, and only remaining course, was that proposed by the Bill—namely, to alter the general rule of law; to leave settlements to be made where advisable, but in other cases to make the property of the married woman her own until she chose to part with it. If she pleased she might make a gift of it to her husband."—[3 Hansard, ccii. 601-2.]

It was upon these authorities and in this state of the law that he asked their Lordships to make the change proposed in his Bill, which he believed would be perfectly just and safe. He believed that the experience of other countries entirely disproved the reality of the dangers which many people were, in argument at all events, apt to assume would follow this alteration in the law. Was it true that the domestic happiness and purity of this country were so superior to the happiness and purity of other countries? That was a question which every one must answer according to his own feeling and judgment; but if it were true, it was certainly not because of the English law which enabled English husbands to rob English wives of their property. The English Law of Settlement and the existence of the Court of Chancery itself were a standing protest against the system of the law as it now stood. There was not one of their Lordships who would, on the marriage of his daughter, leave her unprotected, and to the tender mercies of the English Common Law. If that was so in their own case, why did they hesitate to apply the same principle to all? On the whole, he trusted that their Lordships would assent to his Motion that the Bill be read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
(The Lord Coleridge.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would state, as briefly as he could, the reasons why he hoped that their Lordships would not give the Bill a second reading. If his noble and learned Friend who had moved the second reading had considered with a little more care the history of what had taken place in that House in 1870, he thought he would have hesitated before he asked their Lordships to accept principles which they had deliberately rejected at that time. When the measure of 1870 came up to their Lordships' House from the other House of Parliament, it contained substantially the same provisions they were asked to approve in the Bill now before the House; but having himself taken charge of the conduct of that measure, he had been obliged to tell the House that the clauses embodying the principles of those provisions would require complete re-modelling in Committee. Those principles were, on the second reading, strongly disapproved of by Lord Westbury, by Lord Penzance, by Lord Romilly, by the Duke of Cleveland, and in the great part by Lord Shaftesbury, who grounded their objections on the fact that the measure would effect a complete revolution in the institutions of society. Accordingly he (the Lord Chancellor) undertook to so amend the Bill in Committee as to get rid of these objectionable clauses. The Bill went to a Select Committee; and when it came back to the House scarcely a clause remained as when it went up to that Committee. He recollected perfectly well that Lord Shaftesbury, who, on the second reading, had strongly objected to the Bill on the ground that it revolutionized the institutions of society, expressed his gratification at the work of the Committee. That Committee, one of the strongest which ever sat in their Lordships' House, had the whole matter before them. They considered all the arguments and the authorities which had been advanced by his noble and learned Friend, and yet they came to the conclusion to reject all the clauses having the same bearing as those in the Bill now before them. What reason could be shown for re-opening the question now? The circular of the Married Women's Property Protection Association, which advocated the passing of the present Bill, assigned no reason for the alteration of the law which it proposed, and there was the same defect in the Petitions that had been presented to the House in its favour. He wished to ask the attention of their Lordships to what took place on the discussion of the Married Women's Property Bill in their Lordships' House on the 21st of June, 1870. On that occasion Lord Penzance, whose experience as a Judge of the Divorce Court, rendered his views on the subject very valuable, said—

"The Bill would give a married woman the same rights of possessing and dealing with property, and of contracting obligations with third persons, that an unmarried woman enjoyed; while it nevertheless left untouched her status as a married woman. If left untouched her right to be maintained by her husband; she would be able to spend her property anyhow she liked, without any obligation of contributing to the expenses of the household; and when it was dissipated she would be entitled to the support of her husband and to pledge his credit for necessities. As a question of abstract justice this position could not be maintained. The Bill also provided in the most sweeping manner that a married woman might sue and be sued precisely in the same manner as a feme sole—so that there was nothing to prevent her bringing an action even against her husband, founded upon any matter of contract which she might choose to allege. Litigation under any circumstances was thought to have sufficient asperity about it to make people uncomfortable enough; but it was difficult to conceive the relations of a man and wife, plaintiff and defendant in an action, sitting down to breakfast together, passing the day together, consulting their respective attorneys, and then dining together. A married woman, moreover, being at full liberty to contract with the outer world, might carry on any trade she pleased without her husband's consent, so that a man might be startled by the information that his wife had determined to set up a rival shop in his neighbourhood—which at present was prevented by her inability to contract; and, since she would be quite competent to take a partner, he might be still more startled at hearing that she had entered into partnership with her cousin, who need not be a woman. A husband who expected his wife to keep his home and attend to the children might find her opening a Berlin wool shop with her cousin John as a partner. Surely this was an unnecessary corollary to the protection of women's earnings from idle and dissolute husbands?"—[3 Hansard, ccii. 603-4.]

His noble and learned Friend (Lord Coleridge) had referred to what he chose to regard as the fortunate results which had followed in the United States upon an alteration of the law such as he seemed to desire in this country. But some evidence was given in reference to this point which was not unimportant. The following piece of evidence was quoted in Hansard with regard to this particular point. Mr. Cyrus Martin Fisher was called as a witness, and in the course of his evidence, as reported, the following passage occurred:—

" 'Should a wife having property contribute towards the family expenses?'—'It is contrary to the American idea (and so says Mr. Cyrus Field) that any part of the wife's fortune should be used to contribute towards the support of the family. A man ought to be, and is, considered clever enough to be at least able to support his family without calling upon his wife.' "—[Ibid. 611.]

Again, Question 536—

" 'You have said that the responsibility of the payment of household debts lies chiefly on the husband. Suppose the wife, instead of contributing to the establishment, squandered all her money away, would the whole of the responsibility in such a case rest on the husband?' A.—'Certainly, to the extent of all his property. She might squander her fortune just as quickly as she saw fit.' Q.—'She could have no responsibility whatever?' A.—'Not the slightest, so long as his property was in existence.' Q.—'Suppose she chose to squander her money on some other individual, would that make any difference?' A.—'It might create certain unpleasantness in the family, and the tradesmen might require them, when they wanted anything, to pay for it at the time.' Mr. Cyrus Field said the same—'Whatever the distress of the husband, the wife is not legally bound to relieve him.' "—[Ibid. 611-12.]

The Lord Chancellor

On all these grounds he objected to the Bill, and also on the ground that the present law entailed no hardship, inasmuch as it left the husband and wife free to contract with each other as to the deposition of their property. He trusted their Lordships would not let it be thought out-of-doors that after all that had passed they were going to re-open this question again. It was settled seven years ago that married women were not to be unmarried so far as their property was concerned, and that they were yet to retain the marriage tie in other respects. The Act of 1870 had worked admirably, and, moreover, it remedied every grievance upon which any person could put his finger. On every ground he hoped their Lordships would refuse a second reading to the measure. He therefore moved that the second reading be deferred for three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months.")

LORD SELBORNE admitted that there were several points in reference to which the existing law required revision and amendment; but the matter was one involving so much of detail and requiring so large an amount of consideration and discussion that he did not think the present was an opportune moment for dealing with it. He thought that after the statement of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack his noble and learned Friend could not expect to induce their Lordships to deal with the subject—in this Session, at least—and therefore he hoped he would not press the second reading to a division.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he would advert to one point in the noble and learned Lord's speech in introducing this Bill. The noble and learned Lord, in holding up the legislation on this point of the rest of Europe as superior to that of England, said that it was derived from the Institutes of Justinian in the Lower Empire; now, the noble and learned Lord would remember that, at that time, men thought like his friend the lady he had referred to, that it was better for people to live together without being married, and if the Roman Empire had lasted longer the Roman Government would have had to give men a bounty to marry. The noble and learned Lord also said that he would not take their Lordships through the Codes of Europe, and he did well not to do so; for he had seen in Portugal the scandal of a woman making her husband who had squandered his money, what was there called a "prodigal," that was to say, making it impossible for him to obtain credit, and incapacitating him for civil rights. He hoped their Lordships would object to the second reading of this Bill.

LORD COLERIDGE said, that after the discussion that had taken place, he would not put their Lordships to the trouble of dividing.

INDIA—ESTATE OF GENERAL SOMBRE. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH inquired of the Secretary of State for India, If he will give facilities to the authorized agent of the legal representatives of the late General Sombre to inspect certain documents believed to be now at Agra, which were taken possession of by the East Indian Government on the death of the Begum Sombre in 1836, as appears by a paper intituled "East India Badshapore Case," and ordered by the House of Commons to be printed on the 3rd of July, 1865?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he had made inquiries at the India Office, and found that the Papers referred to by his noble Friend were unknown there. No information respecting them could be obtained, and they had no means of ascertaining whether any such Papers existed. All he could do in the matter was to promise that inquiry should be made of the Government in India on the subject, and that any information that was obtained should be communicated to his noble Friend.

QUESTIONS.

RECORDER OF DUBLIN—OFFICE OF REGISTRAR.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether any one has been appointed to fill the office of Registrar to the Recorder of Dublin, rendered vacant by the death of Mr. Hugh Irwin, or to do the duties and receive the fees of the office; and, if so, perhaps he would inform the House, under what statute and by whom the appointment has been made?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON), in reply, said, the Recorder of Dublin had appointed Mr. M'Gusty, a practising solicitor of great respectability in Dublin; but, having regard to pending legislation, it had been stipulated that there should be no claim for compensation, consequent on the abolition or changes made in the duties of the office.

METROPOLIS—ST. MARGARET'S CHURCH.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the Government will take any steps to preserve, or contribute to the expense of preserving, the valuable historical stained glass window in St. Margaret's Church, which is the Church of the House of Commons? In explanation of his Question, the hon. and learned Member read the following extract from a letter on the subject written by Canon Farrer:—

“The east window of St. Margaret's Church was originally intended by the magistrates of Dort as a present to Henry VII. for the marriage of his son Prince Arthur to Catherine of Arragon, and it was meant for Henry VII.'s Chapel, but before it arrived the King died. The window fell into the hands of Abbot Waltham, who kept it till the dissolution of the monasteries. Fuller, the last Abbot, sent it to New Hall, Essex, and it was bought by Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, whose son sold it to General Monk, who buried it to preserve it from the Puritans. It was afterwards bought for 1,000 guineas for St. Margaret's Church. It contains portraits of Prince Arthur and Catherine. I had it examined by Messrs. Clayton and Bell, who reported that no modern artist can restore it, and that the only thing that can be done to preserve it from decay is to encase it on both sides with plate glass, and that this would cost at least £200.”

MR. GERARD NOEL: I heard with interest the letter just now read by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the county of Wexford. I quite concur with him as to the importance of preserving the valuable historical window in St. Margaret's Church; but perhaps he is not aware that the Government have already given £1,500 towards the restoration of the church, as appeared in the Estimates of this year, and I fear there is no fund from which an additional contribution can be made; but I have no doubt, now that the attention of the public has been called to the matter by my hon. and learned Friend, that subscriptions will soon fall in and swell the contribution given by the Government, so that this historical old window may be taken down, properly replaced, and for the future protected from injury.

CRIMINAL LAW — “THE PRIEST IN ABSOLUTION.”—QUESTIONS.

MR. J. COWEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to a book recently published, entitled “The Priest in Absolution;” if he is aware that the book is substantially the same as one for the circulation of which a lecturer against auricular confession was not long ago imprisoned; if he is aware that “The Priest in Absolution” is printed with the sanction and for the use of the “Master, Vicars, and Brethren of the Society of the Holy Cross,” of which there are 700 members, chiefly clergymen of the Church of England; and, if he is prepared to take steps to test the legality of the publication?

MR. FORSYTH asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been directed to the distribution of a book called “The Priest in Absolution” by certain clergymen of the Church of England; and, whether he has considered the propriety of instituting a prosecution, following the example of the prosecution now pending against the publishers of a book called “the Fruits of Philosophy?”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: At the request of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department I rise to answer the Question of the hon. Member for Newcastle, and if I may be permitted to do so, I will at the same time reply to the Question of which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Marylebone has given Notice. My attention has been called by the Questions of the hon. Members, and by a discussion in “another place,” to the work called The Priest in Absolution; but I have no special means of obtaining information on the subject, nor am I aware whether the alleged facts with reference to the work as to which my right hon. Friend has been interrogated by the hon. Member for Newcastle can be substantiated or not. With respect to the work called Fruits of Philosophy, mentioned by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone, I beg to state that the Government have had nothing whatever to do with the prosecution which was instituted against the publishers of that book. As to the propriety of instituting a prosecution in the case of The Priest in Absolution, in my opinion it is no part of the duty of the Government to act as censors of the public morals, and to prosecute the publishers of every book which in their judgment is objectionable; and with regard to the work in question, there is this reason why no proceedings should be taken—namely, that it has not, as I understand, been circulated among the laity, but only placed in the hands of certain clergymen. If the work were circulated among the people, in my opinion those who caused it to be so circulated ought to be, and would be liable to be, proceeded against for the publication of an obscene and disgusting book.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE ASSIZES.

QUESTION.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the fact that the Assizes throughout England have been fixed a fortnight earlier than usual; that this will have the effect of clashing with the Quarter Sessions which must be held on a certain week as fixed by Act of Parliament; that in several counties the Quarter Sessions will have to be adjourned, the courts being occupied by the Judges and the Bar, and that many officers of the county will necessarily be in attendance at the Assizes; and, whether he can give any hopes that this inconvenient state of things will be altered in the future, particularly as it is presumed a gaol delivery will be made at the Assizes whatever the nature of the offences may be?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I am aware of all the inconveniences pointed out in the Question of my hon. and gallant Friend, and I have been in communication with the Lord Chancellor on the matter. He is at the present moment consulting the Judges about it; and if my hon. Friend will ask the Question again on Monday or Tuesday, I hope by that time to be able to answer it.

NAVY—H.M.S. "ALEXANDRA"—ALLEGED INSUBORDINATION.

QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he has any Reports from the Commander in Chief of the Mediterranean Fleet giving particulars of the insubordination lately evinced by the crew of the "Alexandra;" and, if so, whether he will produce them for the information of the House?

MR. A. F. EGERTON, in reply, said, the only Report the Admiralty had received from the Commander-in-Chief of the Mediterranean Fleet respecting the insubordination of the crew of the Alexandra was contained in a Report the substance of which he gave in answer to a Question some days ago. If the hon. Gentleman wished to have that Report in extenso, and would move for it, there would be no objection whatever to laying it upon the Table.

TURKEY—THE BRITISH AMBASSADOR AT THE PORTE.—QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the Foreign Office will ascertain from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, whether there is any foundation for the statement contained in a letter published in the "Times" of June 15, and alleged to be written by a person of rank in the Turkish capital, dated "Constantinople, May 29, 1877," in which, after detailing the representations made to the Sultan by his brother Nourredeen Effendi, as to the negligence of the Sultan's Ministers in conducting the war, the writer asserts that—

"The next day your Ambassador, Mr. Layard, went to the Sultan and spoke much in the same sense, mentioning, too, the fleet remaining at anchor, and Hobart Pasha being here. His Majesty appeared astonished at learning that the Admiral was still here, and said he thought he was gone long since. He immediately called his Aide-de-Camp, Mehemet Pasha, and sent him with orders that the Admiral should take the fleet at once to sea?"

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs did not think there was any necessity for making the letter in question the subject of a special communication to Mr. Layard.

ARMY EXAMINATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is proposed to continue the present system of examinations of candidates for first appointments in the Army, lasting over fourteen days; and, whether it would not be possible, as at the Universities, to test the qualifications of candidates in a shorter examination?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: The Civil Service Commissioners (who have the entire management of these examinations) report that—

“The time occupied by these examinations is necessarily lengthened because the candidates are allowed to choose from a considerable number of subjects.”

The Civil Service Commissioners do not think that the competitive part of the examination could be fairly carried out in a shorter time. The whole examination might, however, be shortened by two days if the preliminary examination, which now immediately precedes the competitive one, and occupies that time, was held at a separate date. A change has been introduced this year by which preliminary examinations have been held in April and May, in anticipation of the examinations in July. This change has worked successfully; and, in the opinion of the Civil Service Commissioners, will make it unnecessary that any preliminary examinations should be held immediately preceding the competitive one.

INDIA—ARMY MEDICAL SERVICE.

QUESTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN (for Mr. STACPOOLE) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he would explain why the examination of medical officers for promotion to the rank of Surgeon-Major (which has been discontinued in the British Army) is retained in the Indian Army; and, whether such examination is likely to be abolished as unnecessary?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The discontinuance of the examination of medical officers for promotion to the rank of Surgeon-Major in the British Army was coincident with an entire alteration in the constitution of that service, whereby the greater number of those officers will not be eligible for promotion at all, as their term of service is to be only 10 years in all, whereas 12 years' service are required to qualify for promotion to the rank of Surgeon-Major. No such change has been made in the Indian Service, and the grounds whereon the system was originally adopted as desirable in the British service still hold good there. The point has, however, been brought to the notice of the Secretary of State by the Government of India; but, as a Report on the general question of the organization of the entire Indian Medical Service is shortly expected from India, it was determined to await that Report before coming to any decision on this individual point.

SLAVE TRADE IN THE RED SEA.

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he has intelligence of H.M.S. “Rifleman” having captured slaves on board two British steamers in the Red Sea, called the “Koina” and the “Rokeby;” what are the circumstances under which it happened; and, whether any or what punishment can be awarded to captains or owners of ships so sullyng the British Flag?

MR. A. F. EGERTON: In answer to the hon. Gentleman, I beg to inform him that on the 13th of March Commander Clayton, of Her Majesty's ship Rifleman, searched the British steamer Rokeby, and found eight slaves on board, who were handed over to the resident police. The same officer subsequently searched the British steamer Koina, and 12 slaves who were on board were released. In neither case did Commander Clayton find sufficient evidence to bring the ships into the Consular Court, or to prosecute the owners or commanders. The Reports which have reached the Admiralty on these occurrences have been forwarded to the Foreign Office, and will be laid upon the Table of the House by that Department. The question as to what punishment can be awarded to captains and owners of British ships so sullyng the British flag should, I think, be addressed to the Law Officers of the Crown.

ARMY—AUXILIARY FORCES—HAMPSHIRE MOUNTED RIFLE VOLUNTEER CORPS.—QUESTION.

MR. CARPENTER GARNIER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, considering the difficulty experienced in finding an officer to command the Hampshire Mounted Rifle Volunteer Corps in succession to Lieutenant Colonel Bower, resigned, he will submit to Her Majesty that that officer's resignation be cancelled, in accordance with the recommendation of the officer in temporary command of the corps and the unanimous wish of its members, as the most probable means of preventing the disbandment of the corps for want of numbers?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: The establishment of the corps is, maximum 60, minimum 36. Its numbers have been as follow:—In 1873, 38 enrolled, 24 efficient; in 1874, 34 enrolled, 21 efficient; in 1875, 34 enrolled, 23 efficient; in 1876, 32 enrolled, 20 efficient. Colonel Bower is 67 years of age, and although fully recognizing his zeal and interest for his late corps, I do not think it advisable to depart from the rule not to appoint officers over 60, or to create a precedent by submitting to Her Majesty that an officer's resignation be cancelled for the mere purpose of endeavouring to maintain a corps of Mounted Rifle Volunteers.

POST OFFICE, WATERFORD.

QUESTION.

MAJOR O'GORMAN asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will be pleased to issue orders for the delivery, on the day of arrival, by the letter carriers of Waterford city, of all letters, &c. received daily in Waterford at 2.45 o'clock p.m. and which, by present regulation, are not delivered by the carriers in question till the day succeeding their arrival?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that after the 2 o'clock delivery at Waterford, letters, averaging only about 70 a-day, were received from six places. He did not think that the people of Waterford would like the delivery to be postponed till those letters were received, but he would make careful inquiry as to the expediency of having another delivery.

THE CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—RE-ORGANIZATION.—QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD SMYTH asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he can state to the House what progress has been made in carrying out the recommendations of the "Playfair Commission" in the case of the In-door Officers of Her Majesty's Customs?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, was sorry to say that no great progress had been made in carrying out the recommendations of the Commission. A memorial from the clerks of the Customs had been received, and had been reported on by the Commissioners of Customs; but the re-organization of great public Departments involved a large amount of labour, and gave rise to questions of considerable difficulty. There were other Departments, moreover, which had stronger claims for prior consideration.

NAVY—THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether Captain Nares has been called upon to give his reasons for his non-compliance with the following extract of his sailing orders:—

"14. It is expected that you will have at least six strong sledge parties and four dog sledges with which to commence further exploration in early spring. All these parties should be employed in the first instance to push out the North Pole party (which should be provided with at least one boat), and upon return from this work some weeks later, the parties for the exploration of the coast-lines should be sent out;"

whether he has explained his reasons for despatching the greater part of his men upon the secondary object of "East and West Coast Lines Survey," and reducing the Polar party to three sledges with two boats, and only two sledge crews to drag them, instead of concentrating all his strength on an effort to reach the highest latitude in accordance with his instructions; whether Captain Markham reported that "He was convinced, at the very commencement of the journey from Cape Joseph Henry, that the journey must of necessity be of the shortest even under the most favourable circumstances, as fifteen men had to drag three sledges and two boats, total weight 5,100 lbs. which to move one mile would necessitate five miles walking and dragging,—in other words, it could not be expected under any circumstances, even with smooth ice, to make good more than two miles a day; that is, altogether, with everything in their favour, not more than 80 miles from the land, and still 350 miles from the Pole;"

whether Captain Nares has explained his reasons for remaining on board his ship, and why he did not place himself at the head of the Polar Sledge Party, he being the only officer in the Expedition with any experience in sledge travelling, to guide them; whether he has inquired why, at the latter end of August 1876, instead of returning,

Captain Nares did not make another attempt to reach the Pole, there being a strong fair wind, and every prospect that the ice had taken off shore sufficiently to enable him to round Cape Britannia; and, whether the Expedition returned in consequence of the outbreak of scurvy?

MR. A. F. EGERTON: I think the best answer I can give to the hon. and gallant Member, without trespassing upon the patience of the House, is to tell him that all the communications which have been addressed by the Admiralty to Sir George Nares relating to his conduct whilst in command of the Arctic Expedition have been laid on the Table of the House, and I must refer the hon. and gallant Gentleman to those Papers for the opinion of the Board upon that officer's proceedings.

POST OFFICE—FEMALE TELEGRAPH CLERKS.—QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked the Postmaster General, Whether there is any foundation for a report which is current in telegraphic circles that it is the intention of the Post Office gradually to discontinue the employment of female telegraph clerks?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: In reply to the hon. Member, I beg to say that I attach very great value to the employment of female labour in the Telegraph Department, and, therefore, I have no intention whatever to discontinue it. I may be allowed to explain that in consequence of the inexpediency, to say the least, of employing female labour in the Central Telegraph Department in London at night, it has been found that the stress of work upon the male staff has become excessive, and, therefore, it has been found necessary to reduce to some extent the proportion of female labour in order to augment that of male labour. As soon as the proportions of male and female labour have been placed upon a footing which may be expected to prove a permanent basis, the introduction of female labour into the service will be immediately resumed.

THAMES RIVER (PREVENTION OF FLOODS) BILL.—QUESTION.

of Works, On what day he proposed to proceed with the Thames River (Prevention of Floods) Bill?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG, in reply, said, that the best answer he could give the hon. Baronet was to read a resolution adopted by the Metropolitan Board of Works on this subject. That resolution was to the effect that the Bill had been rendered so essentially different from that which had been presented to the House by the resolution of the Select Committee, that in their opinion the expenses under it should be paid out of a rate to be levied over the whole Metropolitan area, that the Board did not feel justified in proceeding further with it during the present Session.

MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. ANKETELL.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If, since the Lord Chancellor of Ireland had under his consideration the conduct of Mr. W. Anketell, J.P. and D.L. of county Monaghan, in cutting the throats of certain dogs in Emyvale, his Lordship has taken any notice of the newspaper reports of the trial of Hawkes v. Anketell, in the Queen's Bench, Dublin, on the 14th inst.; and, whether, in view of the evidence brought forth on that trial, his Lordship still considers that gentleman worthy to retain the Commission of the Peace, and to act as a magistrate in Ireland?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, having read an account of the transaction in the newspapers, addressed a letter to Mr. Anketell, requiring an explanation, but had not as yet received an answer.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

INDIA—EAST INDIA LOAN—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON rose, pursuant to Notice, to make the Indian Financial Statement. He said, that within the last four years there had been two famines in India, which had operated with great severity, and the Indian Government in dealing with them had acted upon principles which only three years ago had obtained the unanimous approval of that House. In carrying out that policy, however, it had been obliged to incur an expenditure which the Indian money market was unable to meet. He felt himself, therefore, most reluctantly called upon to ask the House to grant them certain borrowing powers by which to raise a portion of the sum, the expenditure of which could alone avert a frightful mortality. Now, he felt that in asking for those powers it was only right the House should be placed in full possession of the present position of Indian finance, for nothing could be more unfair than that under cover of an appeal to humanity an intolerable burden should be placed on the revenues of India. He was glad the opportunity presented itself for making some such statement, because during the last few months a great deal of attention had been directed to Indian finance and many alarming opinions on the subject expressed. There seemed to be in some quarters a strong impression that the ordinary revenue had been insufficient to meet the ordinary expenditure; that the Indian Government had to borrow to meet every contingency; that it was annually spending large sums in the construction of works which could never be remunerative; and that therefore its insolvency was a mere question of time. Those views, though quite erroneous, were, he must admit, to a certain extent fostered by the necessary complication of Indian accounts, and he might, perhaps, mention, by way of answer to those hon. Members who were disposed to find fault with those accounts, some few of the difficulties with which the Indian Government had to contend and from which the English Treasury was wholly free. The Indian Government, it should be borne in mind, was one which not merely carried on the administration of a Continent, but which performed many of the duties which in England devolved on local authorities, and other functions which here were discharged by private bodies and by companies. Not only had they to meet the whole cost of the administration of the country, but also to find the funds for the relief of destitution caused by scarcity or famine, and to supply the means by which remunerative public works were constructed, which in this country were carried out by private enterprise. They were, in addition, bankers to the guaranteed railway companies and to certain Service Funds, which involved them in numerous transactions which were further complicated by there being two Treasuries, one in England and the other in India, the Treasury in England making payments in gold, while that in India made them in silver. The result being that, as the relative value of those two metals was constantly fluctuating, it was impossible by any prudence or foresight to prevent unforeseen losses, and extremely difficult to make an accurate comparison between different years. Famine was another disturbing element, for it not only increased expenditure, but curtailed the revenue. He hoped the House would be kind enough to make some allowance for the undoubted difficulties with which the Indian Government had to contend when they placed, either by accounts or statements, the past and present condition of Indian finance before Parliament for criticism and approval. There were three separate classes of expenditure which ought to be kept distinct—first, the ordinary expenditure connected with the administration of the country; second, the famine expenditure, which was incurred to save life, and both of which were unproductive. The third class was of an entirely different character, and was at present known as the public works extraordinary expenditure, which was a particular description of investment for the purpose of developing the material resources of India. Now, he desired at the outset of his statement to make two propositions. He should, he believed, be able to prove that the ordinary revenue was more than sufficient to meet the ordinary expenditure; and, secondly, that as regarded the public works extraordinary expenditure, a two-fold process was going on, the annual loss on those works was annually diminishing, while the mileage on railways and the area of irrigation were annually increasing. He could not at the same time deny that Indian finance was liable to dangers from which we in this country were happily free. That must, however, necessarily be the case. We had established in India an European administration, supported by an Asiatic revenue, and there were two dangers against which we had to contend—the curtailment of revenue and a certain expansion of expenditure from which the European financial system was in a great measure exempt. Now, the three years which came under notice on the present occasion were the years 1875-6, 1876-7, and 1877-8. It was necessary to make the comparison between three years, and the House would perhaps be kind enough to bear in mind that the whole of the figures relating to 1875-6 were those of the actual account, while those relating to 1876-7 embraced only eight months of actual account and four months of estimate, those of 1877-8 being entirely composed of estimates. He would now notice an alteration made this year in the accounts. In 1871 Lord Mayo introduced a decentralization scheme by which certain receipts were handed over to the local Governments, while a certain amount of expenditure was also placed upon them, and those sums had since 1871 been excluded from the annual accounts presented to Parliament. It was now proposed to further extend this system, and as a preliminary to such a development of decentralization, it became necessary to bring back the sums excluded into the accounts. An increase of about £1,000,000 was thus effected on both sides. He would now give the amounts for the three years he had named, not in rupees, but in pounds sterling. For the year 1875-6 the surplus was estimated at £506,000, but the realized surplus was £1,668,945. The famine charge in that year, which was not expected, amounted to £508,554. Excluding this charge, the surplus amounted to £2,177,499. The result was all the more satisfactory because in that year the Tariff Bill was passed, by which a considerable remission of taxation was made. At the commencement of the year 1876-7 a change of Viceroy occurred, and Lord Northbrook returned home to his well-earned honours and rest. While his Lordship was Viceroy he gave the greatest and most successful attention to the finances of India, and yet, notwithstanding his undoubted ability as an administrator and economist, he was unable to hand over to his successor a larger estimated surplus than £144,000. This curtailment of the surplus previously available was entirely due to one circumstance—an unexpected fall in the value of silver. This fall affected the Indian Government, because they had to make very large payments in this country in gold. In order to meet these payments they had to sell silver, and the lower the price of silver was the more they had to sell of it, and the extra amount of silver which last year they had to sell to buy the necessary gold was two crores and 33 lacs of rupees. Last year he ventured in his statement to say he did not think the fall in the price of silver would cause any deficit; but, unfortunately, as soon as silver began to resuscitate itself a terrible famine broke out, which occasioned a very large loss of revenue from ryot wari settlements. This year, therefore, had had to encounter a two-fold load of disaster. This famine differed from that in Bengal in 1874, because there the Zemindars occupied the place of middlemen, and thus averted the otherwise certain falling off of the land revenue. It was estimated that in 1876-7 there would be a loss of £1,384,500 in land revenue below the Budget Estimate; of £92,500 in Excise; and of £20,000 in Forest. If there had been no famine the revenue would have been £1,223,000 in excess of the Estimate of last year. The expenditure for the year 1876-7 was £1,727,471 in excess of the Budget Estimate; but this was entirely due to the famine, which caused a direct expenditure of £1,911,504. There had been, in addition, given to the Army as compensation for increased dearness of forage and provisions £80,000, bringing up the total famine expenditure to the sum of £1,991,504. The other heads of expenditure remained tolerably stationary. There was an increase on opium of £601,803, due to advances; but the most important feature in the finance of the year was the extraordinary increase in the traffic receipts of the Guaranteed Railway Companies. The gross traffic receipts were estimated at £8,557,500, whereas the sum realized was no less than £10,317,300. As the working expenses had not increased in proportion, the net loss upon the guaranteed interest was reduced from £1,260,000 to £420,051. The Delhi Assemblage caused an increase of about £90,000, and the famine had increased the corn and grain traffic to the amount of about £290,000; but the rest was due to a bond fide increase in goods traffic generally, and of that increase the most important arose in the export of wheat. The quantity of wheat exported in 1872-3 was 320,000 cwt.; in 1875-6 it was 2,156,000 cwt.; and in 1876-7 it rose to 4,839,000 cwt. It was difficult to over-estimate the importance of the growth of this export trade. He was informed, too, by experts that the quality was excellent, and that it would favourably compare with American and Russian wheat. He had very little doubt the present high price of wheat would largely increase the export trade, and very materially assist us in getting rid of our silver.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT wished to know whether the exports came to England entirely, or whether they went to other countries?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he was afraid he could not answer the question off-hand, but he could easily obtain the desired information. His impression, however, was that the greater portion came to England. They had the enormous advantage of £95,500,000 of guaranteed railway capital, which greatly stimulated trade, and for which the loss on interest was only £420,051. The expenditure on the famine amounted to £1,911,504, and on the Army to £80,000. This, together with the loss of revenue, and making due allowance for the traffic receipts, gave a net loss of £3,198,000. That loss converted the estimated surplus of £144,000 into a deficit of £1,858,158. If there had been no famine there would have been, in spite of the loss caused by the fall of silver, a surplus of £1,340,346; therefore, his statement last year that he did not anticipate a deficit from the fall in silver was very considerably under the mark. The revenue last year was £51,220,713, and the expenditure £53,078,871, showing a deficit of £1,858,158. For the year 1877-8 Sir John Strachey estimated the revenue at £52,192,700, which was £971,987 over the Estimate of the preceding year; but the continuance of famine reduced the revenue by £528,400. The expenditure, including £1,425,000 for the famine, amounted to £53,014,400, showing a deficit of £821,700; but, excluding the net charge for the famine—namely, £2,052,000—there would have been a surplus of £1,230,300. The net cost of the famine for two years was £5,250,504. The increase in Land Revenue, Excise, Customs, Stamps, and Post Office, could not be advantageously compared with that of previous years, as the famine had so disturbed the revenue of that year. The revenue from opium was purposely estimated at £566,800 below the sum received in the preceding year. The State railways gave a gross income of £674,800, and exhibited a net gain of £190,000, as against last year's gain of £104,000. The Army expenditure was increased by £633,878, including a charge postponed from last year of £200,000. The remainder was due to increased pay to Native troops and British non-commissioned officers, and to compensation for dearness of forage and provisions. The direct expenditure caused by the famine was £486,504 less than last year, and the total expenditure showed a decrease of £64,471. The main features of Sir John Strachey's Budget had been the extension of the decentralization scheme, which he had done a great deal towards carrying out in 1871. Sir John Strachey then said that—

“For years before Lord Mayo became Viceroy the ordinary financial condition of India had been one of chronic deficit, for the demands of the Local Governments were unbounded, and there was no limit to their legitimate wants. They saw on every side the necessity for improvements, and they had a purse to draw upon of unlimited, because of unknown, depth. Their constant desire was to obtain for their own Provinces as large a share as they could gain from the general resources of the Empire. The Government could check these demands only by imposing on the Local Governments the responsibility of maintaining their finances in a state of equilibrium. The distribution of the public income degenerates into a scramble, in which the most violent has the advantage, and the chief evil is that the growth of local income does not tend to local advantage.”

That was the state of affairs with which Lord Mayo had to deal, and he transferred to the Local Governments the administration of the gaols, the police, education, registration, medical services, printing, roads, and civil buildings. To meet the expenditure so transferred he handed over the receipts of services and allotments amounting to £5,667,000. This system placed great and increased powers in the hands of the Local Governments. It had been in operation for five years, and was a complete success, both administratively and economically. In the year 1863-4 the Services cost £5,112,000; in 1868-9, £6,030,000; in 1875-6, £5,305,000. The scheme led to no fresh taxation, the powers were given only in the Punjab and in Oude, and the total of local cesses, rates, and taxes in 1877-8 was only £2,233,000. The weak point of the scheme was the tendency on the part of the Services to increase in cost, whereas there was no inducement to develop the revenue. Sir John Strachey, however, now proposed to extend this system by handing over further revenue to the Local Governments to meet the costs of other Services to be transferred to them. For the present year this extension of local responsibility would be limited to the North-West Provinces and Bengal. In the North-West the receipts of Land Revenue, Excise, Stamps, Administration, Law and Justice, the net assignments of which, together with other casual receipts, amounted to £698,000, were given to that Government. The cost of the Services now transferred, together with those taken over by the Local Government in 1871, amounted to £1,352,000; and the allotment therefore made, in addition to the sum of £698,400, would be £653,600, making a total equivalent to the cost of the transferred Services. In Bengal the same principle would be adopted, the revenue surrendered being £1,910,000, and the expenditure to be incurred £2,370,000. This transfer involved no fresh taxation, but a saving of £101,700 was effected, whilst a guarantee was also given by the Local Governments of a normal increment of transferred revenue of £44,000, making a total saving of £145,700. This extension of the principle of decentralization would considerably relieve the Supreme Government of the increasing duties imposed upon it, for the telegraph was a great centralizer, and yearly accumulated the responsibilities and anxieties of the central authority. These powers handed over to the Local Governments were subject to strict rules and regulations, the most important of which were that no fresh taxation could be imposed, no change could be made in the management of the revenue, and no fresh expenditure entered into without the consent of the Central Government. Sir John Strachey also proposed to hand over to the Local Governments the irrigation works constructed by the Imperial Government. Railways were beneficial to the whole country—it would be difficult to define any territorial limits of advantage—but it was different with regard to irrigation works. They only benefited the locality within which they were carried on. They proposed, therefore, to hand over to the North-West and to Bengal—and to those two Governments only at first by way of experiment—certain irrigation works; but before doing so, they required guarantees for the payment of the interest of the sums expended. In the North-West that outlay amounted to £5,560,000 up to the end of the financial year 1877-8, of which £2,310,000 was expended on works not yet in operation. The works in operation paid much more than the interest on the outlay, but the Indian Government could not afford to give up any of that surplus revenue. They also required 4½ per cent on the works not yet in operation. The total sum to be paid by the Local Governments would amount to £269,500, towards the payment of which they received £169,500 from the canals put under their management. There remained, then, the sum of £100,000 to be raised by taxation; but that sum would, probably, be reduced to £80,000 in five years. This £100,000 was to be met first by a light licence tax, and, secondly, by a power to assign 10 per cent of the rates now leviable in the North-West Provinces. The total of those rates was £430,000, and the increased taxation would fall very lightly considering the number and area of the population upon whom it was imposed. The amount of capital expended on the canals in Bengal was £8,000,000, and he was sorry to say those canals did not pay. On the contrary, some of them scarcely cleared their working expenses, but they were of great benefit to the localities in which they had been constructed. It was believed, however, that, if handed over to the Local Government, their revenues might be considerably developed. The amount of interest to be paid was £270,000, and this would be raised by local cesses and an irrigation rate; but the latter was for the present postponed. It had been urged on the part of the Zemindars that this proposed taxation would be an infringement of the permanent settlement. Mr.

Lord George Hamilton

Eden had entered into a correspondence with them on the subject, and had, he thought, shown that they were in error. Sir James Stephen some years back argued the same question in this way—

“It may be asked what good there was in the permanent settlement, what great benefit it conferred upon the landowners of Bengal if it left their property subject to taxation. The answer is that it reduced to a certainty one particular charge on the land which had previously been of variable amount, and so freed the landowners from uncertainty which had previously hung over them in respect of it. Under the old system of land revenue, worked as it was by the old Governments, it was, at all events, a debatable question whether the Zemindars had any private property in the land after all. Not only was this question debatable, but it was hotly debated, and I think that any one who reads the papers which were written to show that the Zemindars were mere farmers of the revenue will be obliged to own that much may be said in support of that opinion. Since the permanent settlement their proprietary right has been undoubted, and the line between their property and that of the State has been clearly defined, and is no longer subject to increase, in consequence, to use the words of the permanent settlement itself, ‘of the improvement of their respective estates.’ To affirm that because the line has been drawn between the State’s share, the Zemindar’s share, and the ryot’s share in the land, the shares of the Zemindar and the ryot have been freed from all further liability to taxation is nothing less than to argue that by the act of creating property in land and defining the extent of that property the Government relieved the property which it had so created and defined from that which is the common liability of all property in all countries and under every possible system of government, the liability to taxation. I hardly know how to argue against such confusion of thought.”

Mr. Eden, who was perhaps better acquainted with the condition of Bengal than any other civilian, had discussed the matter in full, and when he asked the opposite side what other tax would they propose, the only suggestion that was made was that there should be an increase of the salt duty. The fact was that Bengal was more lightly taxed and richer than any of the other Provinces. Under the permanent settlement she paid £8,000,000 less land revenue than she would have to pay if the land revenue were liable to revision. No less than £6,600,000 was recently expended to avert famine from Bengal and charged on the revenues of India, and he did not think it, therefore, at all too much to ask Bengal to contribute to the maintenance of those canals which might prevent a repetition of that calamity. The total gain to the Estimates from this scheme of decentralization would be £520,000; the maximum amount of taxation would be £325,000; and therefore, putting it roughly, while one rupee would represent the gain from additional taxation, two would represent the saving to the Imperial revenue from closer supervision and better administration. But the scheme would require and receive close watching. The further extension of the system would be most useful in future famines. At present there was a system in force which would certainly not work in this country. When a famine broke out the Local Government made a demand on the Supreme Government, the Local Government being the spending authority and the Supreme Government finding the funds. There was, therefore, a sort of natural antagonism between the two. It was due to the sound principles which Lord Northbrook laid down that they were able to meet the famine which had now occurred at much less cost than before. There was no doubt that the famine in Madras and Bombay was much more serious than had been the famine in Bengal; and yet, while the whole direct cost of the Bengal famine had been £6,600,000, the whole direct expenditure on the Bombay and Madras famine would be only £3,300,000. Lord Northbrook’s principle was that the Government should not interfere with private trade, but should only step in to supplement it when it failed to save the people from starving; and that was the principle acted upon by the Government on the present occasion. The experience of Sir Richard Temple, who had lately assumed the Governorship of Bombay, had been most advantageous in reducing the expenditure and introducing order and method into the famine administration. Sir Richard Temple had been severely attacked for what he had done, but he had a very difficult and delicate task to perform, and great credit was due to him for not flinching from the difficulties. The latest news received from both Provinces was encouraging. The south-west monsoon had broken on Bombay, and there had been heavy showers in Madras. But while they expected that the estimate of expenditure in Madras would be exceeded, that in Bombay would be reduced. The net result of three years, including famine expenditure, was—Revenue in 1875-6, £51,310,063; expenditure, £49,641,118—showing a surplus of £1,668,945; in 1876-7, revenue, £51,220,713; expenditure, £53,078,871—deficiency, £1,858,158; in 1877-8, revenue, £52,192,700; expenditure, £53,014,400—deficiency, £821,700. He had dealt with the three financial years which had come under his own immediate observation, and he would now make a few remarks on the general condition of Indian finances. The charge generally made against the Indian Administration was that while their expenditure was unduly increasing, their revenue remained stationary. That, however, was not the case. Taking the year 1869-70, a year selected by Sir John Strachey, and comparing it with 1875-6, he found that the revenue in the former year was £50,901,000, against £52,515,787 in the latter. But the income tax, which had since been abolished, was in force in 1869-70, and increased the revenue of that year by £1,100,000. Excluding that, it would be found that the same taxation, somewhat reduced, which brought in £49,800,000 in 1869-70, brought in £52,500,000 in 1875-6, being an increase of £2,700,000. Turning to the expenditure side of the account, he found that in 1869-70 the expenditure was £50,782,412, and in 1875-6 it was £50,846,842. But in this last year there was an exceptional charge for famine of £500,000, so that the ordinary expenditure was only £50,251,000, or £600,000 less than in 1869-70. That showed the inaccuracy of the assertion that their expenditure was increasing in a greater ratio than their revenue. The next charge brought against the Indian Administration was that if the revenue of the year was sufficient to meet the ordinary expenditure whenever any exceptional occurrence took place, they were obliged to go into the money-market and borrow. He had laid on the Table of the House a statement giving the total revenue and expenditure, including the cost of famines, but excluding public works extraordinary, from Mr. Wilson's time in 1861-2 down to the end of the present year, and it showed that though they had to meet exceptionally heavy famine expenditure and the extra charge owing to the fall in the value of silver, the surplus of revenue over expenditure had been upwards of £2,000,000. But there was at the bottom of that statement a Return showing the increase of debt during that period. That increase amounted to £32,666,828, of which there had been a redemption of East India stock to the amount of £4,579,416, leaving the net increase of debt £28,087,412. That increase was due to public works extraordinary. It might be asked, What were public works extraordinary, and what did they get for that increase of debt? Many years ago—he believed Lord Dalhousie was the first Governor General who initiated the principle—the Indian Government determined to construct railways by borrowing. They felt it impossible to do so out of their ordinary revenue; and as a necessary consequence of determining to construct railways by borrowing, they had to put aside a certain portion of their revenue in order to meet the difference between the interest on the sums borrowed and the net receipts from the works on which those sums were expended. They commenced to put that principle in practice through the agency of the guaranteed companies. They borrowed indirectly through those companies, and they applied the money which the companies raised to the construction of the railways. That system was in force up to 1867, when Lord Lawrence wrote a very elaborate Minute in which he showed that the system of giving a high guarantee on the capital raised by the companies was most expensive, and that although it had secured excellent lines, the advantage of which could not well be over-estimated, yet that they were economical neither in their construction nor in their management and working. Therefore, it was determined to abolish the system of borrowing through the guaranteed companies, and the Indian Government adopted instead the simpler plan of going into the money-market themselves, borrowing money at a lower rate of interest, and expending it themselves. As long as the guaranteed companies were in existence the capital thus annually expended on railways was excluded from the accounts; and all that the accounts showed was the net loss on the annual transaction—that was to say, the difference between the net receipts which were handed over to the Government and the guaranteed interest which it

paid to the companies. In 1861-2 the loss on guaranteed interest on a capital of only £35,000,000 was £1,425,000. The loss on capital expended when it had been increased by £60,500,000, as it had been since 1861-2, being now £95,500,000, was only £420,000 last year. Therefore, although they had increased their capital expended on railways by £60,500,000 the net annual result was £1,000,000 better than in 1861-2. It was important to bear that in mind, because hon. Gentlemen sometimes expressed regret that the days of the former system were gone. But during the time when the guaranteed companies were disbursing £6,000,000 and £7,000,000 a-year on the construction of railways, that money was borrowed at high interest. Since then the system of public works extraordinary had been started, under which the Indian Government themselves constructed their railways and canals, and borrowed money for that purpose themselves. But in their honest anxiety to show what the exact result of their expenditure was, they had adopted a form of account which he must admit was somewhat misleading. It was a form of account which, as far as he was aware, was the opposite of that adopted by any commercial company or by the Government at home in analogous cases. Parliament had laid down the rule by which railway companies in this country presented annual accounts of their revenue and capital expenditure. In the case of the Indian Government, the whole capital expenditure on public works extraordinary was charged against the ordinary revenue of the year; and, of course, the result was what was called a deficit. The accounts relating to public works extraordinary ought to be clear, first as regarded the sums expended; secondly, as to how they were obtained; and thirdly, as to the results. It was very difficult to understand those accounts as at present prepared, receipts from these works and revenue being so mixed up as to be unintelligible. Lord Salisbury, therefore, thought that some alteration should be made, because their present form was in every way disadvantageous. In the first place, it gave the public the impression that they annually spent more than they received, because they could not otherwise carry on the administration of India. In the next place, if in that House he tried to the best of his power to state the actual results of those public works extraordinary and their revenue, some hon. Member got up on the one side and expressed astonishment at his audacity in having put the figures too high, and another got up on the other side and expressed surprise that he had put them several millions too low. Again, it was asked, if they could ascertain what was the revenue from those works, why not place it in their accounts? At present there was a common fund from which they met all the various charges that were made upon them. Soon after he entered upon his present office the House granted powers to raise a certain sum of money in this country for defraying the expenses of the Bengal Famine. They accordingly raised £5,000,000 for that purpose in 1874, and the Indian Government also raised £2,500,000 in the same year. The famine expenditure was included in the ordinary expenditure and charged to ordinary revenue. Now, the ordinary revenue in those two years turned out so much better than was expected that there was actually a surplus of £150,000 on the transactions of those years. But they borrowed £7,500,000 in order to meet that famine; and the question was, where did it go to? Into the cash balances; and the only thing clear was that the famine had cost them so much and that but for the famine they would not have had to borrow what they did. It was impossible to trace, under the present system, the exact application of these loans. Some alteration of the accounts, then, was necessary. Lord Salisbury proposed to effect some alterations in them; and as the alteration was important, copies would be found in the Vote Office, so that Gentlemen interested in finance might be able to trace their principle. They proposed, as they were engaged in what was undoubtedly a commercial transaction, to deal with the matter as a commercial one, and to have an accurate revenue and an accurate capital account. The first step they would take was to ascertain what was the total amount expended on those so-called public works extraordinary, which consisted of irrigation canals and railways. That could be easily ascertained. They would treat the whole of the money thus expended, whether it came from revenue or from loan, as borrowed money, and they would then deduct that sum from the permanent debt. There would, therefore, in future be two debts—the Permanent Debt and the Productive Works Debt. They next proposed in the revenue account to keep the revenue derived from productive works distinct from the income derived from taxation. The revenue from productive works would include receipts from irrigation, land revenue due to irrigation, and railways. The accounts would show the exact amount annually obtained from each of those works. On the expenditure side they would charge interest on the Debt incurred for those works, also the working expenditure for each work. The accounts would, in fact, show the total expenditure on public works extraordinary, and the receipts from them; so that the actual result of the transaction might be seen at a glance. The result would be that any hon. Gentleman would at once perceive what works were paying and what were not. The only objection to this proposal which he could conceive was that by excluding the capital expenditure they might be led to an unlimited expenditure; but a moment's reflection would dispel any such notion. The amount of expenditure incurred was of secondary importance—what were of primary importance were the returns. They could afford to expend a large sum if they got a good result; but they certainly could not spend a large sum if they got no result from it. The hon. Baronet the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had a Notice on the Paper to the effect “that the present rapid increase of the debt of India, notwithstanding the enjoyment of profound peace, is inconsistent with financial prudence.” Now, if they increased the debt in order to meet their ordinary expenditure he agreed with him, but it was quite a different thing if they increased the debt to construct remunerative works. They also proposed to adopt the English system of applying the surplus revenue of any year to the reduction of the debt. Suppose there was a surplus this year of £1,000,000, and next year it was necessary to borrow £3,000,000 for the construction of public works, they would reduce the permanent debt by that surplus of £1,000,000, and they would charge to Reproductive Works Debt the whole £3,000,000. There would be two accounts of interest. If they were able to reduce the permanent debt, the interest on it would be reduced; and if they could so carry out their works that year by year there should be a reduction of their annual cost to the State, there would on both accounts be an annually diminishing loss. The only State railway constructed and in working order was the Rajpootana Railway. This was now the third year of its working, and it already paid 5 per cent on the capital expended in its construction. He could not but regard that result as eminently satisfactory. The expenditure on public works extraordinary in 1875-6 was £4,270,629; in 1876-7 it was £3,764,614; and in 1877-8 it was £3,628,000. At the commencement of the Session a Motion was made by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into Indian finance. The Government did not accede to that proposal; but if, next Session, it was desired to have a Select Committee to inquire into the expediency of increasing debt by constructing public works, the Government would not object. The expenditure upon public works extraordinary had been conducted upon certain principles, and it was shown in 1872-3 that the total loss upon the whole of our public works extraordinary, including guaranteed interest on railways, was £2,357,696—that was to say, that amount constituted the difference between the net receipts and the interest on the sums borrowed for construction, together with the working expenses of the works in operation. It was further estimated that after spending £4,000,000 annually up to 1879-80, the loss would be reduced £1,939,806; yet this estimate calculated the loss on the guaranteed railways at upwards of £1,200,000, whereas he had shown it to be only £420,000. The revenue had been reduced by the abolition of the income tax and other remissions in 1873, and Lord Northbrook, in the same year, sanctioned a proposal by which public works extraordinary were developed, and an annual sum of £4,500,000 was to be spent for five years. The amount spent between 1873-4 and the end of the present financial year ought, therefore, to have been £22,500,000. The actual amount expended was £19,486,121. The surpluses realized were £9,362,207, being annual surpluses of about £2,000,000, leaving only £10,103,914 to be borrowed. If, therefore, there had been no famine, they would have been able to expend £19,466,121 on public works extraordinary, only borrowing the difference between that and the surpluses realized—namely, £10,103,914. But unfortunately the Bengal famine and the Madras and Bombay famine had cost the enormous sum of £11,861,591, to be added to the expenditure on public works extraordinary, making a total expenditure of £31,327,712. They had borrowed £17,174,032, and that, with the surplus £9,362,207, about £2,000,000 a-year, made a total of £26,536,239. They, therefore, required £5,000,000 to meet the difference. But he feared they would want a little more, because the withdrawal of the railway capital was very much in excess of the payment, and there were a great number of debentures due in India which would have to be taken up. The Indian Government had advertized to borrow £2,500,000 in India, and they had received from Native States about £750,000, which would be absorbed by debentures coming due. There would, therefore, still remain £2,500,000, which would be necessary to carry on the famine expenditure and meet the expenditure of the year. He therefore asked from the House the power to borrow £2,500,000 in this country, and to have power to add this sum to the permanent debt. That was considerably less than the Indian Government estimated they should have to borrow—which was £3,750,000; and it was no breach of confidence to say that that sum was, in the opinion of the Indian Government, the minimum which they would require to borrow during the year. Now, notwithstanding the increase of their debt which he had mentioned, he believed the actual net charge to the revenue of India was now less than it was at the commencement of the year 1873-4—that was to say, including the guaranteed interest, as well as the interest upon the permanent debt. They could have afforded to have regarded with equanimity that increase of debt if the whole of it had been raised in India. But, unfortunately, a very considerable portion of it had been raised in England; and if there was one danger to Indian finance more serious than another, he believed it was consequent on the increase of disbursements in this country. This was all the more serious because it was not altogether under our control. So long as our connection with India lasted, so long would those disbursements certainly not diminish. There were certain things which India required from Europe which could only be got from Europe. India wanted European soldiers to protect her. She required European administrators to govern her; she required European capital for her public works, and European energy to apply that capital. As year by year the cost of almost everything increased, so India had to pay for everything she wanted here the market price of this country. The traffic receipts of the guaranteed railway companies were still increasing. There was only a net charge of £420,000, but the actual disbursements they had to make in this country amounted to more than £5,000,000, and the better those railways paid the larger the sums we had to pay here. It was once the fashion to imagine that the India Office was at the bottom of all these large disbursements. Only abolish the India Office, it was said, and these disbursements would cease. But that was a great delusion. There was no part of the business of the India Office more carefully done than that of checking expenditure in this country; but, as he had said, the increase of disbursements in this country was not altogether under their control. For instance, as the cost of the whole British Army increased, the proportion of it contributed by India necessarily increased also, and so long as the present principle of payment remained in force, that result would be inevitable. In the matter of stores, of which India required an enormous quantity, he was happy to say that last year they had done good business. They bought 31,000 tons of iron rails at about £6 per ton; whereas in 1873-4 they paid £13 per ton. This year, again, they had paid about £8 per ton for steel rails; whereas in 1873-4 they paid £18 per ton. So that, great as had been the fall in the price of silver, the fall in the price of iron had been still greater, and it was well worth their while to continue to make purchases in that commodity, even when the rate of exchange was heavily against them. The home disbursements of the Indian Government might be roughly estimated at between £15,000,000 and £16,000,000, which was met by selling bills payable in silver in London. Now those bills were drafts upon the Indian Treasury, and for all practical purposes might be regarded as silver. They to a considerable extent regulated and controlled the price of silver in London. The Indian Government had thus unconsciously drifted into an enormous commercial undertaking, which was nothing more or less than the sale of from £15,000,000 to £16,000,000 worth of silver a-year. But although their wants were constant, the demand for silver was variable. At the present moment the East was the great consumer of silver, Europe making little demand for it; but the appetite of the East for silver was intermittent. The consequences of forcing silver upon the London market, which, he believed, regulated more or less the price of silver throughout the world, were very unfortunate. The low price of silver sold by us was only an infinitesimal portion of the evil inflicted on India. Silver being the standard of value in India, any sudden fluctuation in the value of that metal affected not merely the amount of silver sold, but the whole metallic currency of the country, the price of all stocks measured in silver, and the value of all transactions regulated by this standard of value. A remarkable example of the effect of forcing silver upon an unwilling market was given last year, when, between January and July, on £2,739,000 worth of bills, the price of silver fell 11 per cent. Now, he did not mean to say that the amount of the silver sold was the cause of that fall—there were, no doubt, other causes at work, as the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen) had very ably shown—and great apprehensions were aroused by a fear of these causes; but the sale of Indian bills in London when there was no demand for silver, was the lever by which those apprehensions exercised a most exaggerated effect upon the market. The Indian Government were, therefore, in this most unfortunate position. If they forced their silver upon the market when there was no demand for it, they reduced the price of silver and gave rise to fluctuations which were most injurious to Eastern trade, and if they borrowed money in this country they only put off the evil day. The question then arose—If, on the one hand, it was unwise to increase future liabilities by borrowing, and if, on the other hand, there were times when it was equally unwise to force their bills upon the silver market, what were they to do? As a means of escape from the difficulty, Mr. Bagehot, whose financial ability had been acknowledged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in making his Budget Statement, and who had rendered signal service in many questions connected with Indian finance, suggested that they should issue Treasury bills renewable from time to time. He (Lord George Hamilton) had therefore to ask the House to give them additional power to issue Treasury bills to the amount of £2,500,000, on the distinct understanding that that power should only be used when they could not possibly sell their bills. By that means they would be able to attain a two-fold object. They would, on the one hand, be able to keep silver steady, and, on the other hand, they would not add to their permanent debt in this country. Fluctuations in the value of silver were absolutely ruinous, inasmuch as they disturbed the whole basis upon which merchants and bankers calculated their profits and drove capital into different channels free from such danger. The Secretary of State, he believed, was the first publicly to announce the impolicy of increasing the Indian debt in this country, and the House might rest assured that if they granted the reserve power now asked for, the Indian Government would use it with the view of avoiding any increase of their liabilities in this country, and of selling as much silver as they could without injuriously affecting the market. At the instance of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), a Return was in preparation showing the total amount of the Indian Debt, and another of income and expenditure was now in course of preparation. The Secretary of State thought that Returns of that kind would be interesting, and he had accordingly ordered them to be produced annually. There were, no doubt, dangers ahead which required constant watching. On the other hand, the revenue was steadily increasing, and the cost of public works extraordinary was, he believed, annually decreasing. He would not go into figures on this subject, because they had been disputed; but he intended, by adopting a new form of account, to provide a certain method by which statements could annually be tested. If, however, the revenue was satisfactory, it could not be denied that a retrospect of the expenditure was the reverse. They had had to contend with the most extraordinary combination of adverse circumstances, as it appeared to him, that any Government had ever been called upon to face. They had had two successive famines, an incredible fall in the price of silver, and a steady continuous depression in trade. It was perfectly clear that if nature was to visit India every year with the curse of famine, the measures he had enumerated would not be sufficiently stringent to meet the increased strain on the financial resources. But whether there was, in the future, a period of prosperity or scarcity, he believed the proposed reforms would be efficacious in either case. In concluding, he hoped the alteration he had made in the accounts would make clear to every Member of Parliament that which had hitherto been a source of perplexity and misunderstanding, and that by adding to their information it would serve to give new zest and interest to the performance of those responsible functions by which that House controlled and supervised the finances of our Indian Empire.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Lord George Hamilton).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL rose to move the following Amendment:—

"The present rapid increase of the debt of India, notwithstanding the enjoyment of profound peace, is inconsistent with financial prudence, and renders necessary such a revision of the system as may provide, during times of peace and prosperity, a large margin of income applicable either to reduction of debt or to works really remunerative; and, in order to carry the above securely into effect, a high and independent authority should decide whether expenditure which it is proposed to exclude from the ordinary account may be properly classed under 'extraordinary,' as being, from a commercial point of view, a prudent investment likely to pay."

The hon. Member said, that all in that House must acknowledge the financial ability which the noble Lord displayed more and more every year when he came to lay the Indian Budget before that House. His statements were models of clearness and ability, and the House was indebted to him for the improvement that had taken place in the Indian accounts as they were now presented to the House. He was afraid, however, that the talent for official finance which the noble Lord had developed might militate against him, and induce him to put the best face upon the matter, to take too sanguine a view of Indian finance, a view which he (Sir George Campbell) thought the present condition of affairs did not justify. There was a great difference between finance as applicable to England and India. Chancellors of the Exchequer had taken, and very properly taken, a sanguine view of the finances of this country; but the noble Lord was scarcely justified in doing the same in the case of India. In this country we ruled our own people, and in case of emergency we might rely upon them to furnish resources by additional taxation; but in India it was different, because in times of trouble and adversity it would be quite impossible to appeal to the people for extraordinary means to meet our extraordinary needs. Strong as our position was—and he believed it to be stronger than many people supposed—yet we could not attempt in critical and troubled times to raise more money by fresh taxation. He was of opinion, therefore, that if in England in times of peace and prosperity it was considered necessary, as far as possible, to reduce our Debt—and he was glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had recognized the fact—it was of still greater importance in India to put by as much as was possible for a rainy day. He regretted, therefore, the sanguine view which the noble Lord had taken of the finances of India. The rule was that every year was exceptional, and no provision was made for accumulating a surplus, or for the reduction of debt, or to prevent borrowing, and this year the demand for loans was unusually heavy. £3,000,000 had already been asked for in India, and now they were asked to sanction a further £5,000,000, the greater part of which was to be spent during the current year. He (Sir George Campbell) was afraid that the finances of India would be worse in the future than they had been in the past. It was true that now railways, instead of being guaranteed by the Government, were made by the Government, but with an open capital account there was much temptation to shift that which should be revenue expenditure to capital, and he was afraid that this was the tendency when they saw some of these expenses put down as "extraordinary." The view he took of the financial position of India was not his own, but was founded on the best possible authority—namely, an official statement. A Return, to which the noble Lord had referred in the course of his speech, had lately been laid on the Table of the House, giving figures showing the financial position during 17 years, beginning with the time when Mr. Wilson introduced his financial reforms. The comparison there given of income and expenditure showed on the whole period a surplus of £2,900,000, but he ventured to think the statement misleading. The whole of that surplus and a good deal more was gained in the first five years, when the additional taxation introduced by Mr. Wilson was imposed. Indeed, in those five years there was a total surplus of £4,600,000. In the remaining dozen years there was on the whole a considerable deficit, to which was to be added the deficit of the present year—namely, £2,500,000. Moreover, in the first five years the extraordinary public works were included, while in the last dozen years they were not. In fact, many works for which credit was now claimed as capital, as, for example, the Ganges Canal, were made before the system of works extraordinary was established at all. That being the state of the case, he was, he thought, justified in saying that our financial position in India was not improving, but deteriorating. A good many millions had been expended, for which there was nothing to show, and no provision had been made for a rainy day. The noble Lord, indeed, at the end of his speech had very candidly admitted that the retrospect was not very pleasant, and in that view he quite concurred. As to the future, he would rely solely on the remarks which he was about to make on the official statement of Sir John Strachey in the Council of the Governor General of India. Sir John Strachey as a Finance Minister was very much in his place. He was clear-headed, and there was not in the public service a more able or zealous man. The lines of financial reform sketched by him were, he believed, good lines; but although the system of decentralization introduced by Lord Mayo was entirely successful, he was not sanguine that we should be able to recover our financial position by that means. The only fault he had to find with Sir John Strachey was that he was a little too sanguine; but in his statement he showed that an estimated surplus for the year 1877-8 would be converted into a deficit of £278,000 by a fair statement of the account. That was the statement of the responsible Financial Minister as to the revenue of the current year. As regarded the future, Sir John Strachey took also a very unfavourable view, which he derived from a consideration of the very seven years to which the noble Lord had alluded, for after going through certain details he said that during the past seven years the Government of India had just managed to bring their expenditure within their income, famine excluded, but that famines could not be omitted from their calculations, and, he added, that they had now no income tax. Was the noble Lord prepared to admit that the views of the official organ of the Government of India were right that the revenue was barely sufficient to meet our ordinary expenditure, making no provision for famine or the reduction of debt? If so, did he look upon our position as one characterized by prudence? He should imagine not. Our present position in India, considered politically, was most favourable, and he trusted that it might be maintained. He hoped that what was going on in Asia would not—indeed, he thought it would not—involve risk, as he believed that we might for years stand aloof from the affairs of Russia in that direction with impunity. At the same time, he pointed out that circumstances might arise which would make an increase of military expenses in India inevitable; and, considering all the contingencies and risks of the future, it would be imprudent to trust to a revenue which went no further than to meet the ordinary and necessary expenditure of the year. The general result of a long study of the subject had been to convince him that in future the increase of our Indian revenue would be very slow,

Sir George Campbell

and that we could not look to it for the relief of our finances to the extent to which they ought to be relieved. If it were the case that we had barely provided for the ordinary wants of every day, without providing for famine and other occasional demands, we ought to do something in the way of righting our finances. If it were found impossible to improve the state of our finances in any other manner, he thought we should boldly face the task of introducing in some shape additional taxation. This was a course which the Government of India had now to a small extent adopted; but he was not favourably impressed with the measures taken in that respect during the present year. As to an irrigation tax, while admitting it was justifiable in principle, he thought there were very great difficulties in regard to it in practice, and therefore the Government had acted prudently in instituting inquiries on the subject. He assumed the Government of Bengal at a time when the Government of India were of opinion that the financial position was not secure, and it became his duty to impose a tax on the land of Bengal for local roads. He was strongly of opinion that a rate of that kind was one to which the land of Bengal was fairly and justly liable. He had, however, pledged himself, as the representative of the Government, that the tax should be local and for the benefit of the people themselves. That was the form taken by the road cess in Bengal, and the people had appreciated it. Its success had been such that he only feared lest they should run into extremes and impose too many taxes of that kind. He quite admitted, of course, that other rates would have to be imposed if Bengal was to have the advantage of the intended improvements; but he hoped that as the present new tax had been imposed for Imperial purposes, the Government of Bengal would not be saddled with the cost of a past failure. He would not put himself in opposition to the views of the Government, but he hoped that his statement of the case would be considered. His own contention was that temporary makeshifts should not be used, and that the Government of India was too much influenced by political cowardice, our position in India being much stronger than was generally supposed. They were strong enough to impose burdens—necessary burdens—in times of peace and prosperity, and not in times of financial disturbance. His opinion was the absolutely necessary funds should be raised by large and comprehensive measures; and his own practical belief was that, as the taxation of the people of India was not at all heavy, it would be much better to do what was necessary now than to throw an increasing burden on the future. What was wanted was a margin of income from which debt might be reduced or money invested. He quite sympathized with the noble Lord's regrets at the continued increase of payments made by this country on account of India; but he would remark that these payments were the natural result of an increased debt, and that, in spite of this, power was now asked for a heavy loan. The money market of India would not admit of a loan being issued there; but in times of peace and tranquillity this necessity for borrowing ought not to exist, and the money should have been obtained in India. With regard to what had been called "famine finance," he was glad to see that the Government of India freely admitted that at one time the famine charge had been excessive. There had been great oscillations of opinion as to the right course to be taken as to famine; but, on the whole, he believed that the happy mean between parsimony and extravagance had been attained. Something should be done towards localizing the famine charges, for the principle of localization was as necessary in India as in England. Local areas should meet their own local charges, and some system should be followed by which money might be accumulated year by year to cover these expenses. As for the public works, he would only say that however necessary an extraordinary account might be, it would have to be used carefully, and not abused, as had been done in France. While not doubting the good faith of the Government, the House ought to have some check so as to distinguish between the ordinary and the extraordinary expenditure of India. At present the temptation was to throw upon the extraordinary expenditure a number of items in order to make things pleasant. The House was indebted to the noble Lord for the new form in which the accounts were now presented; but he thought he still saw the signs of an over-sanguine spirit. The indirect benefit of unremunerative public works could not be brought into the balance-sheet, and had been too much insisted on. If a railway in this country that did not pay at all or only paid 2 per cent put the actual receipts at £500,000, and the profit supposed to be gained by the landowners and others at another £1,000,000, everyone would condemn this as an arbitrary and unreal mode of account. The indirect benefit of these public works might be considerable, but the Government did not get the money into their coffers. If these public works were to be treated as commercial undertakings, their accounts must be kept like those of a private company, and it would then be fair to say that the loss was only moderate. But accounts of estimates of indirect gains were mere guess work. As regarded the Great Trunk lines and other guaranteed railways he (Sir George Campbell) fully and entirely admitted their success. They had already almost paid interest on the cost of their construction, and their future prosperity was undoubted. The Government, however, were making lines through sparsely-populated districts, political railways and certain unremunerative canals, and if they lumped up the guaranteed companies which paid with the undertakings that did not pay, the result would be fallacious. In future the real amount of the expenditure and income of each ought to be clearly shown. There ought to be a sinking fund to pay off the capital in a certain number of years. In all the Committees upstairs provision of this kind was made in regard to local undertakings; but there was no such sinking fund in India. He could find no mention of the Madras Harbour in the accounts. It was a work which would not be remunerative, and which was being made with borrowed money, and these local works were too often hid out of sight and kept out of the Imperial accounts. There was great danger in the practice which seemed to be springing up of the Native States coming into the London Money Market to raise loans. One considerable State put forward as a pretext its great anxiety to establish public works; but the result would be to bring about too intimate relations between these States and the London Money Market. These States were evidently anxious to follow in the path of the Khedive of Egypt. The Government were, however, the rulers of India, and these States were but tributaries, and it would be much better to let them understand that the Government would undertake all the great and remunerative public works, and that as to the rest, they had better save the money out of their ample revenues and make their public works for themselves. There were, necessarily, great complications and difficulties in these accounts, and it was desirable to have a competent authority in the nature of some tribunal, like a Joint Committee of both Houses, so that the accounts might be well sifted and a high audit established. The noble Lord said the Government would not object to the appointment of a Select Committee next Session, if it should be the wish of the House, to deal with the finances of India—[Lord GEORGE HAMILTON: With the Public Works Extraordinary]—and if the noble Lord followed out that intention which he had expressed, his (Sir George Campbell's) object would be to a great extent obtained; and therefore while moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice he probably should not press it very far if he found the opinion of the House was not strongly in favour of it.

MR. SMOLLETT: It is fortunate for India that, from circumstances which officials could not control, the finances of our Eastern Empire have been brought under the cognizance of Parliament in 1877 at a period when some attention can be paid to them. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), in February last, proposed that a Select Committee should be appointed to inquire into the condition of Indian Finance, and the proposal was largely supported by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Upon that occasion I entered into a searching examination of the causes of the maladministration of the Indian Revenue. I showed distinctly that the huge and persistent excess of expenditure over income was mainly caused by useless outlays of money upon unremunerative works falsely styled reproductive. I pointed out that the late Lord Mayo, the only capable Viceroy who has in recent years ruled in India, had reduced the expenditure in two years by nearly

£5,000,000, and I declared my belief that a like reduction could be made in 1877, if the administration of India was placed in proper hands. No reply was made to these statements; they were met by gross personal abuse, and by official misrepresentation of facts. To-night, on the 21st of June, we have submitted to us the Indian Financial Statement. We are indebted for this fact to the necessity that exists to borrow money in London to meet the deficiencies of the Indian Exchequer. But for that necessity the production of the Indian accounts would, by dexterous management, have been deferred to the 10th or 12th August, as has been the case in the two last Sessions. It is with regret that I am compelled to speak of the financial management of our Indian Empire as discreditable. It would be much more agreeable to me if I could speak favourably of the conduct of Indian finances, under a Conservative Government to which I have always given a loyal and disinterested support. Under a Liberal Administration a bad system was introduced, it is still continued, and matters daily go from bad to worse. Remembering as I do the lavish disposition evinced by Lord Salisbury, in 1866, when for a short period he was Secretary of State, recollecting the intensity of his belief in the random assertions then propagated of enormous profits arising from irrigation projects, I was led in 1874 to fear that the selection of the noble Marquess to fill the office of Indian Secretary a second time would not be a happy one. When, too, a few weeks after his accession to office, Lord Salisbury complimented highly in "another place" the Indian Public Works Establishment; when he expressed his satisfaction that that Department had works estimated to cost £17,000,000 in hand, and when he announced his intention to sanction a further outlay upon one single irrigation work of £15,000,000, I was satisfied that the noble Lord had learned nothing and had forgotten nothing during seven years of exile from official life. My fears were somewhat assuaged in August, 1874, when, upon the 4th of that month the Under Secretary of State launched his Financial Statement in Committee. The fairness and propriety of the noble Lord's statement disarmed me. I have learned since to place no reliance upon Financial Statements coming from the India Office. The principles then propounded were reassuring. The noble Lord apologized for the appearance of an item of expenditure in the Indian Accounts amounting to £4,250,000 as an outlay on Extraordinary Works. This policy formed no part, he said, of the programme of the present Administration. It was a legacy left to the Office by the Duke of Argyll. I had hoped that the amount would have been reduced, but this has not been the case. This expenditure has been persevered in, and with the worst results. The noble Lord said that frugality should be the order of the day—that every endeavour should be made to keep down the Home Charges. The Under Secretary of State in August, 1874, assured the Committee that every ordinary want of the year should be defrayed from the Revenues of the year, that no loans in the future should be incurred to meet ordinary expenditure. The noble Lord stated most positively that if money was wanted for reproductive purposes, the money must be borrowed in India. A stringent scrutiny, it was said, was now applied to all Estimates for Extraordinary Works, and none were sanctioned, unless it was clear that the undertakings would repay the interest and ultimately would recoup the cost price. Lastly, the Under Secretary gave the House the most positive assurances that no loans in support of Indian Finance should hereafter be negotiated in London. Now, in my judgment, no faith has been kept either in England or in India upon those points. Upon the 10th or 12th March last, the Finance Minister, Sir John Strachey, introduced the Budget of 1877 in the Council Chamber in Calcutta. He commenced by stating that the Revenue of the year which had just expired fell short of the Expenditure by £6,000,000. He announced that the Estimates of the present year showed an excess of expenditure of £4,250,000, but dexterously manipulating the accounts he made it clear that the financial position was satisfactory and the future most promising. While making these strange observations, Sir John Strachey was compelled to make some scandalous revelations. Sir John admitted at once that no steps had ever been taken in India to exclude unproductive Works from the Extraordinary Budget. He said that they had been always included to a great extent. He said that ordinary and unproductive Works in this year to the tune of £1,206,000 had been so included in the Extraordinary Budget, and he promised not to do this again. But Sir John Strachey went further, he said that during the last seven years—from 1869 to 1875—there had been carried under the head of Extraordinary to Capital account, sums amounting to £4,770,000, expended upon State Railway Works that were never supposed to be reproductive. With £1,206,000 included in the present year, here was a sum of £6,000,000 improperly transferred from current to Capital account. That was the Finance Minister's Statement. In addition, I could enumerate Irrigation Works that have cost £5,000,000, made with borrowed money, which have never returned a shilling of profit. Lord Lytton, on the 1st May, admitted the correctness of Sir John Strachey's allegations. Lord Lytton said—

“That although orders had been sent from England many years ago to exclude from the Extraordinary accounts unremunerative Public Works, the orders were never acted upon. This should be done in future.”

Nay more, he said he doubted whether an extraordinary Budget was not altogether a mistake. Well, that is my thunder. Lord Lytton has stolen my policy, and described it as his own. But what, I ask, was the position in which these revelations placed the Secretary of State for India. Lord Salisbury, believing that Extraordinary expenditure applied exclusively to reproductive outlay, has continually expressed his satisfaction and his pride at the large surplus receipts of ordinary Revenue in India. Last year, in March, in “another place,” he boasted of having carried into the Indian Exchequer £8,671,000 in four years of real surplus. The Under Secretary, under similar delusions, boasted of magnificent surplus receipts. In February last, I denounced these calculations as simply fudge. I charged the officials in India with manipulating—that is, “cooking the accounts.” This expression was met with indignant condemnation. But it was true. The Financial Minister and the Viceroy himself admit that the accounts were delusive and deceptive. Under these circumstances, I think an apology is due to myself for the impertinent language applied to me by the Under Secretary of State. But I have no expectation that any such reparation will now be made. So much for the present position of Indian Finance. Now let us look to the proposals for the future. The Indian Finance Minister has told us that no new taxation was to be imposed in India during the present year for Imperial purposes. He announced, however, that a large extension of what was called the scheme of decentralization was to be made. Very few hon. Gentlemen possibly understand what this means. I shall endeavour to explain it; and I shall use Sir John Strachey's own words. The policy of decentralization applied to a Province means that this Province was to be compelled to meet its own local requirements in the future. And, so far as I can see, this principle is to have retrospective effect. Ostensibly this appears a fair and reasonable proposition; but it really was a most tyrannical policy in its application. It would be very fair to make a Province responsible for its requirements, and to compel a Province to pay the interest of loans incurred for its necessities, provided the Province was autonomous, provided the people had a voice in the outlay, and had approved of the works, and had sanctioned the outlay. But when these undertakings were carried out by an autocratic Government, swayed by a corrupt Public Works Establishment, without consultation, and often against the express desire of the owners and farmers of the Province, then to compel the people to recoup that Government for the expenditure incurred, when the works proved to be total failures, was rank tyranny. Now that was the policy to enforce which a strenuous effort was now being made in the Province of Lower Bengal. That Province had been in the hands of speculative engineers for the last seven years. On irrigation canals alone £4,000,000 had been expended up to 1875, and the plans to complete the undertakings required some millions sterling more. The works did not return a shilling outlay; they were worked, in fact, at a great loss. I can enumerate these works and their present cost. First, there was the Orissa Canal. Capital in 1875, with unpaid interest on the capital, £1,912,000. The interest on that capital is £95,000. The loss on working this canal in 1875 was £16,000, and therefore that canal cost the Government £111,000 a-year.

Mr. Smollett

Then there was the Midnapore Canal—capital £750,000, interest £37,500, loss on working £1,500, and total loss on these two works £150,000 a-year. Lastly, there was the great Soane work, estimated to cost £3,000,000; but up to 1875 £1,200,000 only had been spent. This work yielded nothing, and, apparently, it never would yield anything. The three works have cost £4,000,000, and several millions sterling were needed to complete them. Well, what was the proposal to recoup the Government under this decentralization system. It was this—the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal has been ordered to levy what I may term a benevolence of £275,000 a-year to recoup the Government for this most wasteful outlay. From whom was the benevolence to be levied, from the landlords?—the Government would not undertake to levy this blackmail from the peasantry, because the tax or cess would lead to agrarian outrage. The landlords are told they may recoup themselves if they can. Any outrages that might follow would be attributed to landlord rapacity. This was the system about to be introduced to bolster up the Public Works Department; I think I am justified as denouncing it as atrocious. It was well for the Government of India that the population of Bengal was unwarlike, and was disarmed. If the country was occupied by a military population, and if the Indian Government had a neighbour like Russia to stir up strife, this Province under such a system of administration would be made too hot for the British authorities. Holding those opinions, I am not disposed to sanction a Bill to raise money in support of an execrable policy. I may be told that the money was needed to meet the Famine Expenditure, and that it was not to be spent on Extraordinary Works; I beg to meet such an assertion with the most positive contradiction. It appeared from the public accounts presented to the House that the amounts expended upon “Public Works Extraordinary,” a great portion of which had been wholly unproductive, were in the last six years more than £21,000,000 sterling. The expenditure under this head in 1872-3 was £2,184,500; in 1873-4, £3,553,500; in 1874-5, £4,249,500; in 1875-6, £4,146,000; in 1876-7, £3,800,000; and in 1877-8 the sum entered in Sir John Strachey’s Budget was £3,628,000, making in round numbers an expenditure of £21,500,000 in six years upon unproductive Works. The excess of Imperial expenditure over income during the same period stood as follows:—In 1872-3, £419,000; in 1873-4, £5,360,000; in 1874-5, £3,930,000; in 1875-6, £2,601,000; in 1876-7, £6,076,000; and in 1867-8 the deficit was estimated at £4,250,000. Thus in six years the deficits amounted to £22,600,000, while £21,500,000 had been expended on extraordinary and unproductive undertakings. But for this expenditure upon worthless Works there would have been nearly an equilibrium of income and expenditure, and no addition to the Public Debt of India would have been required. In the Estimates of 1877-8 there was an item of more than £3,500,000 sterling for unnecessary Works. If this be struck out from the Estimates no loan in London for Indian purposes would have been needed. To raise a loan in Great Britain when money was being squandered in India upon Public Works Extraordinary was a proposal to which I shall not give my assent. In conclusion, I beg to second the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “the present rapid increase of the debt of India, notwithstanding the enjoyment of profound peace, is inconsistent with financial prudence, and renders necessary such a revision of the system as may provide, during times of peace and prosperity, a large margin of income applicable either to reduction of debt or to works really remunerative; and, in order to carry the above securely into effect, a high and independent authority should decide whether expenditure which it is proposed to exclude from the ordinary account may be properly classed under ‘extraordinary,’ as being, from a commercial point of view, a prudent investment likely to pay,”—(Sir George Campbell),

—instead thereof.

MR. LAING said, that he had abstained from taking part in discussions on Indian finance for some time, because he thought the more they talked about India the more harm they did. There was a constant tendency, as far as he had seen, in this country both to swell expenditure and to diminish receipts. He did not want to go back to old times, when India was involved in wars by Imperial considerations for which she had to pay; but to come to more recent times, he thought the amalgamation of the Indian with the English Army after the Indian Mutiny was effected in a much more expensive way, because the views of England were forced upon India contrary to the opinion of Lord Canning—a statesman then on the spot. He believed that it was owing very much to the manner in which that amalgamation was effected that Indian finance was now embarrassed, and that with a diminished military force we were not able to realize reductions of expenditure which we had a right to expect. With regard to the question of public works, upon which the hon. Member who spoke last had dilated with so much vigour, he could perfectly well recollect the very strong pressure put on the Government of India in this country, in the direction of spending money on public works, especially navigation and irrigation.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present;

MR. LAING continued: With regard to famine, which had cost so much, there could be no doubt that opinions expressed in English newspapers that lives might have been saved by increased expenditure had an influence on the officials in India, and tended very largely to increase expenditure. He mentioned that simply as showing how expenditure had been increased. Then, if they looked to the revenues of India, as far as he knew, the influence exerted in this country by a party would go to the destruction of the whole duty from opium, to sap and utterly derange the whole fabric of Indian finance. There were cases in which English opinion brought to bear on Indian finance had done injury; and he thought that it was a credit to the good sense of the House that in the main it left Indian questions of finance to those who were acquainted with the details. The issue at stake appeared to be this—Two great calamities having overtaken Indian finances—that caused by the famine and that caused by the depreciation of silver—the question was, how were they to be met? The Government proposed to meet them by raising a small loan and so tiding over the evil time; whereas the hon. Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs (Sir George Campbell) thought the best way to grapple with the difficulty was by resorting to heroic measures, and by raising the necessary funds by increased taxation. For his own part he preferred the Government scheme, and he thought the hon. Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs did not thoroughly appreciate the dangers that might result from increased taxation in India, and that he had exaggerated the financial difficulty of the position in which they now stood. He (Mr. Laing) was satisfied that increased taxation would be attended with a great deal of discontent and must necessarily lead to much oppression in that country; and he felt that the present state of that part of the Empire did not warrant us in resorting to a plan which must lead to such a result. In order to arrive at a just conclusion upon the subject, however, hon. Members should have a clear view of the present position of Indian finances. Taking the last nine years, he found that six of them had been years of surplus and three of deficit. The aggregate surpluses amounting to £8,476,000, and the aggregate deficits to £5,588,000, which left an average annual surplus extending over the whole nine years of £320,000. It was true there had been an additional extraordinary expenditure spread over those nine years of £18,733,000. With regard to that extraordinary expenditure it was impossible to draw any rigid line and say what should be charged to capital and what to revenue. If they had carried out the rigid doctrine that no public works were to be charged to the capital, it would have been impossible to construct any railways in India. The railways which they were now constructing might not be so productive as the Great Trunk lines laid down by Lord Dalhousie; but they were constructed at less cost, and were now yielding 5 per cent. It had been urged that the revenue of India was not sufficient to meet the requirements of the country; but he did not think the statement was accurate. It was true the finances of the country were not in a brilliant or flourishing condition; but he thought it could not be denied that a very sound and steady progress had been made, notwithstanding the fact that the income tax had been repealed. There had been an increase, for instance, under the head of the land tax, the customs, the salt duties, the stamp duties, and the revenue derived from public works, which included the State railways and irrigation works. As regarded opium he compared the yield from it for a number of years to prove that its returns had been uniformly steady, and he did not see why it should not be so for the next 10 or 20 or 30 years also. But for the disturbing elements of the change in the value of silver last year and the famine there would have been a considerable diminution in the expenditure, accompanying a large increase of revenue. With regard to the depreciation in the price of silver, he thought it would not be well to take any steps until sufficient time had elapsed to enable the Government thoroughly to appreciate the difficulties of the situation, the chief of which was owing to the exigencies of trade, the substitution of a gold currency and standard of value for the silver standard which had existed up to the present time. The two disturbing causes in respect of Indian finance to which he had referred—namely, famine and the depreciation in the price of silver—ought to be watched by the Government with care and caution; and above all they ought not to launch into extraordinary expenditure for public works, even such as were likely to prove profitable, as freely as in other circumstances they would be justified in doing. The most stringent economy possible ought to be exercised; but that was a thing which could not be enforced by Resolutions of the House of Commons or by Reports of Select Committees. It involved questions of detail to be dealt with by a prudent Governor General with able men under him, and who would go through the almost innumerable items of expenditure one by one, and see where consistently with efficiency reduction was possible. India, in fact, must be governed in India. They ought to appoint the best men that could be found for the high position of Governor General, and then give them a full and generous confidence. For his part, he believed that the Government of India had been well and wisely carried on for the last 20 years. Mistakes had, no doubt, been committed; but, on the whole, the Government had been prudently conducted, and the finance of India had been wisely administered by a succession of men of precisely the type which the circumstances required. He had been somewhat alarmed by some of the wild utterances on the part of the present Governor General with regard to frontier policy indicative of a departure from that wise policy of masterly inactivity inaugurated by Lord Lytton's predecessors. But he was glad to learn from a speech of the Marquess of Salisbury that such a course as the one suggested by those utterances was really not intended. He, therefore, presumed they might be considered as a little effervescence on the part of a man of genius going out to India with fresh impulses; and he had no doubt Lord Lytton would be sobered down in his policy when he came under the influence and experience of the Indian Council. Such a departure from the wise course as the utterances of the noble Lord pointed to could not be attempted without a serious interference with Indian finance. With wise economy, he believed the present difficulties would be removed, and that India would recover from the temporary causes of depression which now existed and be more prosperous in the future than she had been in the past.

MR. ONSLOW expressed his regret that an attempt should have been made to count out the House in the midst of so important a discussion, and he felt sure the proceeding was one which would be resented by the country. He had read the Financial Statement of Sir John Strachey with much interest. He was glad that Statement had been made openly before the Council instead of being published in The Gazette. He feared that the hopes of Sir John Strachey with reference to his ability to remit or reduce taxation in India were too sanguine. One of the taxes he trusted to be able to remit was that on inland Customs, which brought in £2,500,000; but he (Mr. Onslow) did not think that the finances of India would for many years be in a state to bear that extraction. It would be a long time, too, before they could afford to give up the £850,000 duty on cotton goods, whatever they might individually think of that impost, and the day was distant when the financial position of India would justify them in abolishing the duty on salt. No doubt the duty pressed upon the masses somewhat; but the masses ought surely to pay something towards the expenses of the Government of India. He was afraid the Budget last proposed was rather of a sensational character, but the time had gone by for sensational Budgets in India. The increase of Bengal paper currency from £4,000,000, in 1864, to £12,000,000 at the present time was a proof of the prosperity of the country. He could not see that the circulation of five and 10 rupee notes was necessarily an argument against a gold coinage in India. The real objection to a gold coinage was the impossibility of regulating the ratio between the silver and gold currency. The Government had been called upon for further economies; but successive Governments had honestly tried to reduce the public expenditure as much as possible, and he did not believe that in any one branch of Indian expenditure any material economies could be made. The question of additional taxation was of serious importance. Mr. Wilson had tried the imposition of an income tax; but it had been taken off by one Indian financier, and again imposed and again taken off by his successors. It would never be popular in India, and he could not see how the Government would ever be able to get at proper returns. The difficulties of collection, owing to the frauds practised by the Natives, were insuperable. The salt duties had been enhanced, but the duties on Customs were not capable of any further increase. Tobacco had been specified as a means of raising additional revenue, and no doubt the Government could raise a certain amount by taxing it; but the tax would fall on the very people who now consumed salt, and who could not well bear the two imposts. He thought that by a system of licences, first proposed by Mr. Massey, more might be done to raise additional revenue than by a hard-and-fast income tax, and we might have to resort to a licence tax some day. The objection to succession duty was that you would never be able to ascertain on whom and on what to impose it. It was a most difficult thing to tax the people of India for the purpose of obtaining additional revenue. He could not see the immorality that was said to exist in the imposition of the opium duty, considering that India merely provided as a merchant a certain commodity which people out of India were glad to obtain; and therefore he hoped no Viceroy of India would entertain the idea of taking off £6,500,000 of net revenue, which it would be impossible at the present time to raise by any other tax. No doubt the item of Public Works Extraordinary offered a temptation to include unremunerative works, accompanied by plausible reasons why they might be regarded as highly remunerative in the future. He believed it better to spend money on railways than on irrigation works, because the Natives would rather starve than take the water, while railways would be of great use for the transport of food to avert famine. Scarcely one of the irrigation works could be considered remunerative; only two were paying their working expenses; but he believed we should ultimately derive a revenue from the railways. We had made advances to Bombay on the security of a special land fund, and, although the land had been valued at £3,000,000 or £4,000,000, and afterwards at £8,000,000, the land had not been sold on account of the depression of trade. He should like to hear how much of the money advanced on this security had been repaid; and he hoped the House might now rely upon the assurance that had been given that no more public works would be undertaken unless investigation showed that they were likely to be remunerative.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that during the 22 years that had elapsed since Lord Dalhousie left India the debt of India had, with the exception of a few years, yearly increased. Assuming the year ending 30th April, 1857, to have closed his great administration, the debt in India and in England was about £59,000,000. At present, it might be about £135,000,000 or £136,000,000. It was necessary to speak in this qualified manner as to the exact amount of debt owing to the many changes in the annual accounts, which rendered it impossible for any private Member of the House of Commons to make out, with any exactness, the real state of the indebtedness of India. The increase of debt in 22 years might then be taken to amount to about £76,000,000 or £77,000,000. In that amount was included the adjustments made in respect to the settlement of the Proprietors Stock of East India Shares, and the Security Fund lodged at the Bank of England for that Stock. It might also be accepted as covering the debt due to the service funds, which, having been taken over by the Government, necessarily led to the accumulations of those funds being also taken over, and that debt, formerly included amongst the "obligations" bearing interest, was then cancelled. But the accounts failed to show with clearness the real state of those transactions. Within seven years after Lord Dalhousie's administration the debt increased from £59,000,000 to £104,000,000; in the three years following it was reduced to £98,000,000; but since 1866 not a year had passed without an increase; and since 1868 it had swelled up by borrowings to about £35,000,000 or £36,000,000. Unless a great change was made in the present scale of expenditure, the debt might augment in a higher ratio in the future than in the past. A comparison of the 22 years' total income and gross expenditure showed, that there had been only five years in which there had been a surplus of revenue over expenditure, and in 17 years the expenditure had largely exceeded the income. The surpluses amounted to upwards of £4,500,000, the deficits to about £73,000,000, leaving a net excess of about £69,000,000. The year which closed Lord Dalhousie's great career, left a surplus. The year which might be said to have closed Lord Canning's financial administration also left a surplus, through the aid which his hon. Friend the Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing) so ably gave in restoring the finances of India. In Lord Mayo's administration surpluses were also left; but in all the other years the statement he had tried to compile showed yearly deficits so large in amount that during the last five years ending with the 31st March, 1877, the deficit amounted to £18,000,000. He stated these figures with great diffidence, for it was difficult for anyone outside the India Office to make out, from the often altered forms and entries, the real amount either of income or gross expenditure. The result of all these deficits was a debt of £76,000,000, of which only £34,000,000 was caused by extraordinary expenditure for public works and famine relief, and we were now about to add £10,000,000 more, including the borrowings in India and England. That was a dangerous condition of things, and there was no reason why India should escape the fate of other countries whose expenditure during a series of years exceeded their income. Not only the military, but also the civil expenditure of India had largely increased of late years. The cost of collecting the Land Revenue, the Customs, the Stamp Duties, the Post Office, Telegraphs, and various other items of the same kind—which had been regarded as a permanent charge—had increased from £9,000,000 in 1868 to upwards of £10,000,000 in the present year. Again, the charges for administration, law, justice, police, education, medical services, &c., were estimated for 1876-7 at upwards of £12,000,000; whereas in 1868 the expenditure under the same heads was only £10,000,000. It was most important that they should endeavour to control in this country the vast expenditure now going on in India. With regard to military expenditure, the noble Lord intimated that they might expect it to undergo some further increase. By the decision of the War Office in this country, India was obliged to receive from the Home Army a large European force to garrison India. Even if Imperial policy dictates to the Government of India that a special European Force for India should not be separately maintained, he thought it would be only fair that the Government of India should have some voice in the arrangements connected with that force, which was maintained at an expense far beyond what needed to be incurred, and casting a very heavy burden on India. There could be no doubt that the organization of the 60,000 men supplied by the War Office to India could be greatly changed, and that, without sacrificing any efficiency, or reducing one private, the expenditure for India could be greatly reduced, and the Home Charges, including the cost of recruiting, also largely lowered. The increased charge for that force was indicated by the noble Lord and by the Finance Minister of India, as one of the many causes requiring money to be raised on loan. The Finance Minister had also placed on the Home Administration of India the entire responsibility for that increasing charge, and intimated that some measures must be adopted to provide additional funds for meeting the yearly augmented military charges, and thus evidently referred to the necessity for additional taxation. But it was a very difficult and even a dangerous thing to add to the taxation of that country. He remembered the time when the late Lord Canning impressed upon him the importance of reducing the military charges, thereby obviating the necessity of increasing the taxation of India, urging that it would be better to maintain our power in that country by a small military force than to keep up a large force, thereby adding to the taxation. Of all the difficulties which we might have to encounter in India, financial embarrassment was one of the greatest; and he would, therefore, strongly advise the Government to abstain from imposing fresh taxation. It would be a more wise and statesmanlike policy, if possible, to reduce taxation. The salt tax was one of the most unjust and oppressive taxes, and it was raised from the poorest classes. It was lamentable to think that a people who lived mainly upon rice should be deprived of a condiment so essential to health as salt. Although, financially, the retention of the duty on that article might be beneficial to the Government, yet, politically as well as commercially, it was a great mistake. If any statesman would boldly do away with that impost on salt alone, he would give a very great stimulus to commercial activity in India. So vast was the bulk of salt requiring transport that the 5 per cent now earned by the Rajpootana railway, mentioned by the noble Lord, mainly consisted of traffic earnings from the carriage of salt. An examination of the income of India during the past 10 years, clearly showed that financial progress had been but trifling. Indeed, the revenue might be considered to be stagnant. The land revenue, which formed so large a portion, was actually less in amount in the year ending 31st March, 1877, than it was in the year ending 30th April, 1866. So also with respect to other sources. After deducting the cost of collection, the net results were far from satisfactory; to that there was one exception, that was salt. But the increase in the salt tax was not traceable to increased consumption, but to increased taxation on that, the great necessity of the poor. It was that article which alone almost had been made to bear increased burdens. It was the article which the wealthy needed less than the poor, and it was the one article which was invariably indicated as the article to be taxed. It might, therefore, be truly said that the revenue of that country was almost stagnant. Another change which he advocated was that of making India a free port. The net Customs revenue by land and sea might be said to vary, after allowing for a variety of charges of collection—for pensions, for buildings, and other items not shown in the accounts—to be between £2,250,000 and £2,500,000, and after taking off the duty on cotton goods, there would be about £600,000 on exports, and the same sum levied on a great number of articles forming the imports. If that country could be thrown open to the commerce of the world, he believed its revenues would greatly increase, and that any sacrifice of revenue from customs, incident to that measure would be far more than counter-balanced by its beneficial results in respect to the political and contented feeling which would follow thereon.

MR. FAWCETT said, there were some considerations of a general character which, he thought, it was important the House and the country should clearly understand before sanction was again given to the piling up of this load of Indian debt. He could not forget that when the present Government came into Office those who took an interest in Indian finance had their hopes raised by being told by the Secretary of State that no public works should be undertaken in India except such as were certain to prove remunerative; that in connection with the construction of such public works as might be entered upon no money should be raised in this country, and that every effort should be made in order that the expenditure might be balanced by the revenue of the year. These were the principles which were to guide the conduct of the Secretary of State; but so far from their being observed, they were cast to the winds by the Bill which was about to be introduced for the purpose of giving authority to the Government to raise £5,000,000. Had this sum been necessitated by the famine he could not, of course, have held the Government responsible. But what was the financial position of India at the present time? It was this—£5,000,000 might be borrowed in England; £2,500,000 had been borrowed in India; and £900,000 more had been borrowed from Native Chiefs, making altogether close upon £8,500,000. But for how much of this £8,500,000 was the famine responsible? He took the estimate of the Finance Minister himself; and that was that the estimated cost of the famine for the present year was only £2,100,000. How, then, were the remaining £6,500,000 to be accounted for? Simply by the fact that the Secretary of State had not kept, or could not keep, to the principles which he laid down for himself when he took office. The finances of India had been presented with a roseate hue, and he had no motive for depicting them worse than they were. The views of the Under Secretary would be correct if the assumptions on which they were based were well founded. Those assumptions were, first, that all outlay on famine was to be treated as an extraordinary expenditure; and, second, that all money expended on extraordinary public works was certain to prove remunerative. The declarations of the officials showed that both these assumptions were absolutely unfounded. In three places Sir John Strachey gave distinct and emphatic warnings that famines were so certain to recur that they must be anticipated exactly as a farmer looked for occasional bad harvests. Sir John Strachey selected the seven years from 1869-70 to 1876-7 as representing the normal condition of Indian finance, in spite of the occurrence within them of the Bengal famine. During the last 10 years there had been four famines—in the North-West, in Orissa, in Bengal, and now in Madras and Bombay; and Sir John Strachey said these 10 years could not be treated as exceptional years. The most important fallacy was the assumption that extraordinary public works were remunerative. The noble Lord the Under Secretary tossed his figures about and said there were so many millions of surplus, and that the debt was to be regarded as capital outlay; but again and again had he contended that there was not a tittle of evidence to show that the money was laid out on remunerative and productive works. £30,000,000 or £40,000,000 had been expended on extraordinary public works; but during the last 10 years no inconsiderable proportion of the outlay had been upon works which, from the nature of the case, though they would be useful, never could return any direct revenue in proportion to the amount expended upon them. £14,000,000 had been spent upon worthless barracks. There was no point upon which Sir John Strachey was more explicit than this—that only a portion of the outlay classed as extraordinary had been devoted to works that could be considered reproductive. In the present year, of £3,600,000 so classed, one-third had been devoted to the construction of railways which could not give a fair return. They were designed, not for commercial, but for political and military purposes, and the outlay ought no more to be regarded as reproductive than the expenditure on fortifications. There was another extraordinary fallacy running through the comparison made by the Under Secretary of State, and also by the hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing), as to the revenue of India in relation to its expenditure now and some time since. That comparison, as it seemed to him, was worthless, as they were considering not net revenue, but gross revenue, and that gross revenue was swelled by items which could not be considered revenue at all. In 1876-7, for example, the real revenue—the amount which the Government of India had to spend—was not £51,300,000, the amount named by the Under Secretary, but about £40,000,000 only. The land revenue was set down at £21,500,000, but there ought to be deducted from that the cost of collecting it—namely, £2,500,000. Forests yielded £600,000, but this was obtained at a cost of over £400,000. Then, again, the salt revenue, and the opium revenue, cost a considerable sum in collection, and the Post Office revenue, which was put down at £700,000, was obtained at an outlay of £800,000. In the same year not less than £1,500,000 was lost by exchanges. Yet on the revenue side there was an item, “gain by exchange £500,000.” It might just as well have been put down at £5,000,000. Making these deductions, the revenue of India at the present time, instead of being £51,300,000, was not a penny more than £40,000,000, and that was all that the Government of India had to spend. In the years 1867, 1868, 1869, and 1870, the net revenue was somewhat higher than the net revenue in 1875-6. This was a significant fact, and threw an instructive light on the misleading comparisons made for the purpose of showing an alleged growth of revenue. Now, the proper way of getting a fair estimate of revenue was to take not the gross, but the net amount, which he again asserted was at the present time not more than £40,000,000. He would compare that fact with one or two others. The Army expenditure could not be estimated at less than £18,000,000. He knew it was put down at £16,000,000, but there were various additional items that ought to be classed with the Army expenditure, which brought up the amount to the figure he had named. It was an increasing expenditure, and would soon absorb one-half of the total net revenue. He regarded the amalgamation of the two Armies as an unfortunate mistake. A poor country like India was unable to bear the strain of an Army managed on the same principles as our own. Sir John Strachey, in his recent speech, stated that the Army expenditure was steadily increasing, and significantly added that the authorities in India had scarcely any control over it. This was the most serious fact connected with the financial position of India at the present time. The Indian Army expenditure was bound up inseparably with our own; and when costly experiments were carried on which England was well able to afford, it was apt to be forgotten that part of the burden had to be borne by a poor country which could not afford them. The Under Secretary had admitted that the Home charges were steadily increasing. This year they found that no less than £16,000,000 were to be remitted home out of a net revenue of £40,000,000, and yet a new loan of £8,500,000 was now to be provided for. Such a policy could not be justified, and would lead to increased financial embarrassment. But it was said by the noble Lord the Secretary for India—"We shall improve our system of accounts, and we are going to set up a great scheme of decentralization." No tossing backward and forward of figures, however, would enable the Government of India to make good a deficit when they were spending more money than they possessed. We were about to lay out a large sum on public works; but, looking on the subject by the light of past experience, could any one say, taking into account the poverty of India, that we were pursuing a wise course in sanctioning the continuance of that policy? The expenditure up to the present time on seven irrigation works was £9,100,000, and the net result was, allowing nothing for interest during the time of their construction, a charge of £320,000 a-year, so that every shilling of this money was spent on unremunerative undertakings. As to the system of decentralization, he could only say that while he did not mean to argue against it, it had its dangers and ought to be carefully watched. There were irrigation works at Orissa on which about £2,000,000 had been laid out, but they did not pay the working expenses, and it seemed somewhat hard that those unremunerative works should be thrown suddenly as a local burden on the people of Orissa, who had no more responsibility than he had for their construction, in consequence of bungling and mismanagement. The Government conferred upon the local authorities to whom such works were handed over the power to raise new local taxes, in order to make good the money required for undertakings which would not pay. But how was the money to be provided? It must be by taxation; and it was a grave danger associated with the scheme of decentralization that its inevitable result would be to lead to the imposition of manifold local burdens which would be withdrawn from the notice of the House of Commons. The noble Lord, he might add, had referred to the appointment of a Committee, and if he had agreed to that course when he himself had asked for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the financial condition of India he should gladly have accepted his offer. But be that as it might, there was one branch of our Indian expenditure—he alluded to the military expenditure—which ought to be inquired into without delay, for it had grown in a few years after the amalgamation of the European and Indian armies, notwithstanding a reduction of 13,000 in the numbers of the former, and of 5,000 in those of the latter, from £14,800,000 to over £16,000,000. Although he had sometimes spoken strongly on the subject of Indian finance, he was quite ready to recognize the difficulties of the task which the authorities, both in England and India, had to perform, and his only object was to strengthen their hands. He knew very well that the House had seldom interfered in the matter of Indian finance, except for the purpose of throwing new charges on the revenues of India. He thought it was greatly to be regretted that the influence of this House should be used in order to obtain money from the Indian revenue. His chief wish was to see a sufficient surplus in ordinary years to cover such events as famine; but he could not think Indian finance wholly satisfactory when the authorities had to borrow money in this country for public works. Nor could the finance of India be considered satisfactory until there was a true balance, on an average of years, between revenue and expenditure; until the system of constantly adding to the debt came to an end; until the Government declined to be the sole constructors of public works. If Government would leave something more to private enterprise, what had happened in other countries would happen in India. Sooner or later English capitalists would invest their money in a country enjoying peace and security under British rule, instead of in foreign adventures, which often turned out deceptive.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, that he fully appreciated both the motives and the criticisms of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett); but he doubted whether he had entirely apprehended his argument. He did not sanction the principle that "Famine expenditure" should be excluded from the Budget. His own contention had been very different; and he had endeavoured to show that there was a large margin available for exceptional contingencies, among which was famine, which could not be considered as altogether abnormal. Neither could he describe as abnormal the expenditure on public works. The Indian Government had sanctioned a certain amount of expenditure for that purpose in the time of the late Ministry. Those works had been begun, and as they could not very well be abandoned, Lord Salisbury had permitted them to be continued; but for the future no works would be undertaken that would not pay interest on the money advanced. As for the Army expenses, they were certainly very heavy, but not more so than they had been some time back. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett) complained of certain public works which did not pay their working expenses. That was true, but it did not follow that all others were worked at a loss. With regard to the Madras Harbour, the hon. Baronet (Sir George Campbell) would find it under the head of "advances." The advances were made with the understanding that the Madras Government would pass a Bill to enable them to tax the shipping that came into the harbour, and thus repay the outlay. [Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL: Was that Bill passed?] No; but their attention had lately been called to the subject, and they had been requested to take the necessary steps. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had raised objections to further "decentralization," in which there might be some force; but, if he recollected aright, he made the same objections against Lord Mayo's decentralization plans, which were now universally admitted to have been successful. With regard to the hon. Baronet's Amendment, he did not know that there was much difference of opinion as regarded the expenditure on public works extraordinary. He hoped, as there would be subsequent opportunities for expressing an opinion in regard to the loan, he would not press his Resolution to a division, but allow the House to go into Committee.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

MATTER considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is expedient to enable the Secretary of State in Council of India to raise a sum, not exceeding £5,000,000, for the service of the Government of India, on the Credit of the Revenues of India."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL could not help saying that the House had been taken somewhat by surprise as to the amount of the loan proposed to be raised in this country. He understood it was only necessary to raise £6,000,000 in all, of which £2,500,000 was to be raised in India; but instead of £3,500,000 the Government now proposed to raise £5,000,000. He did not think a sufficient explanation had been given when it was said that the amount would be raised on short-dated Treasury notes, the object being that the loan should not be a permanent one in this country.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON explained that the Finance Minister in India requested that £3,750,000 should be raised in this country, a sum which was very much less than what at first the Indian Government wished to raise. But the Secretary of State, always believing that it was most impolitic to increase the Indian debt here, has resolutely refused to borrow more than was absolutely necessary, and at some inconvenience referred the subject back to the Indian Government. He explained in the early part of the evening that they could not safely estimate the loan that it would be necessary to raise at less than £2,500,000, and he hoped the House would give power to increase the Funded Debt in this country to that extent. But then there were great difficulties arising from the disturbed state of the silver market which made it absolutely necessary to have some reserve. Some emergency might arise—there might be some heavy fall in silver—which would make it impossible for them to sell their bills. Fluctuations, such as those which had occurred last year, might occur again, which might make it most impolitic for them to force their bills, at all risks, upon the silver market. The German Government had resolutely refused to state what quantity of silver they had got to sell, or whether they meant to sell it, but that they had a large amount in reserve was well known. He had applied for information to two well-known silver merchants in London to know what amount of silver had been sold by Germany, and one of them estimated it at the value of £7,600,000 from the commencement of June, 1876, to the commencement of June, 1877, and the other at £8,225,000. It was therefore necessary to ask for this reserve. By assenting to the Resolution now proposed the House was not bound to any sum whatever; but it was necessary it should pass before the Bill was brought in, when a full discussion could take place on the whole subject.

MR. FAWCETT said, that under these circumstances he should not oppose the Resolution, but reserve to himself full power to move the rejection of the Bill on its second reading, or take any other course he thought proper.

Sir George Campbell

MR. LAING believed it was necessary for the Government to have a reserve, and as the Resolution was a mere matter of form he hoped it would be allowed to pass.

Resolution agreed to; to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

BILL.—[BILL 139.]

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. William Henry Smith, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

COMMITTEE.

(In the Committee.)

Preliminary.

Clause 1 (Short title) agreed to.

PART I.

Amendment as to Loans to Local Authorities and Remission of Sundry Loans.

Clause 2 (Charge of interest on local loans in Ireland, and provisions as to their issue and remission.)

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 11, to leave out from the beginning of the Clause to the word "Exchequer," in line 20.—(Mr. Bruen.)

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA supported the Amendment.

MR. W. H. SMITH opposed it, and stated that the interest charged was only sufficient to secure the Exchequer against loss.

Question put,

"That the words 'All advances out of the Consolidated Fund made by way of loan after the passing of this Act,' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 111; Noes 32: Majority 79. — (Div. List, No. 185.)

CAPTAIN NOLAN proposed the insertion of the word "lower" in the clause, believing that 3½ per cent would be sufficient.

MR. W. H. SMITH objected.

CAPTAIN NOLAN considered that it would be more convenient not to fix the loans at the high rate proposed in the Bill.

MR. BIGGAR was understood to concur in that view.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR JOHN M'KENNA moved the insertion in line 20, after "without," of the words "profit or," before "loss to the Exchequer," the object of the Amendment being that no profit should be made out of a loan.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 20, after the word "without," to insert the words "profit or."—(Sir Joseph M'Kenna.)

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Recovery from grand jury of advance made.)

MR. BIGGAR moved that Progress be reported.

MR. W. H. SMITH hoped the hon. Member would not press the Motion, the Bill being one of importance to Ireland, and the remaining Amendments being unlikely to occupy the Committee more than a few minutes.

MR. BIGGAR said, he would give them five minutes more.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Advances for support of lunatic asylums by county treasurer instead of out of Consolidated Fund.)

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved the omission of the clause.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 90; Noes 16: Majority 74.—(Div. List, No. 187.)

MR. R. POWER, remarking that the five minutes generously given by the hon. Member for Cavan had expired, moved to report Progress.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had no wish to press the Bill on if Irish Members were unwilling, but he intimated that it would be impossible to fix an early day for resuming the Committee.

After some discussion,

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday 5th July.

GAME LAWS (SCOTLAND) AMENDMENT
BILL—(Nos. 44-97.)

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

THE EARL OF MINTO proposed, in Clause 3 (Interpretation Clause), to leave out the 4th sub-section, by which the word "Game" is interpreted to include "all the animals enumerated in the Game Acts, or any of them," and to give a distinct enumeration of the animals that were included within the purview of the Act. The noble Earl said that in an Act of this kind, it was far better to have a distinct definition of what game really was, rather than define it by scheduling a number of Acts of Parliament—some of which were obsolete—and enacting that the animals which were defined in those Acts as game should be taken to be game under this Act. For instance, the first Act referred to in the Schedule, "an Act of the Parliament of Scotland, passed in the year 1587, chapter 43, entitled 'Aganis slayeris of deir and utheris wyld beastis.'" That Act was obsolete. Again, in the discussion of the measure in Committee, he asked his noble Friend who had charge of the Bill, whether wood-pigeons were included in any of the Acts referred to in the Schedule of the Bill. Now, he himself should interpret it as including wood-pigeons; but the noble Earl said that he did not know. Now, it seemed to him (the Earl of Minto) to be monstrous to legislate upon the subject without knowing the scope of the proposed Bill. Was it or was it not intended to include wood-pigeons, because they were certainly quite as destructive to the crops of the farmer as any other birds which were enumerated in the Acts scheduled. There was no question that this Bill dealt with animals feræ Natura, and with a large number of animals that were especially enumerated as "game" in the former Acts. Now, on looking at one of those Acts, the first birds enumerated in the list of game were "bustards." But there was not a bustard in the whole of Scotland—they might just as well insert "pterodactyls" in the list. Again, it was only very recently that snipes, woodcocks, herons, and quails were made game, and then only incidentally, by their being included in the Act passed in the Session of William IV., called the Game Trespasses Act. Before that time they were not game at all. That Act referred entirely to trespasses on property, and it might be quite right to punish persons for trespassing in pursuit of snipes and woodcocks as well as for trespassing in pursuit of any other birds. But it was quite another question whether the Schedule of other Acts could with propriety be called a sufficient definition of "game" as referred to in the Act itself.

Amendment moved, in Clause 3, to leave out sub-section 4, and insert as a new sub-section—

"4. The word 'game' shall mean, deer, roes, hares, rabbits, pheasants, partridges, grouse, black game, ptarmigan;"

and, after sub-section 4, add as a new sub-section—

"5. The term 'Game Acts' shall mean the Acts enumerated in the Schedule to this Act annexed."—(The Earl of Minto.)

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, there were good reasons why it would be very inexpedient to agree with the Amendment of the noble Earl. There were already seven or eight game lists, all of them very full and comprehensive in their character, contained in the several Acts enumerated in the Schedule, and it now appeared to him that the noble Earl wished to add an eighth list—which in his (the Earl of Rosebery's) opinion, would create a considerable amount of confusion, and only supplement in an imperfect manner what had already been done. But when he looked at the amended list proposed of the noble Earl, the first thing he had to consider was whether the lists which were already in existence were either too full or deficient; and it was quite clear from the speech of the noble Earl that he believed they were too full. Now, he did not think there was a rational Member of their Lordships' House but would agree that it was unnecessary to add another to the already existing game list. According to the noble Earl's idea, it would seem that he feared that the wood-pigeon was included because the term "wild beasts" was used, but it might just as well be held to include the Colorado beetle. There was the further objection to the Amendment of the noble Earl that all the clauses of the Bill dealt with contracts; but the 10th and 11th clauses referred to the amendment of criminal procedure under the Game Laws enumerated in the Schedule, and the penalties of those Acts could only be exacted under the game lists in those Acts.

THE EARL OF MINTO said, he had no such wish.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: Then it was absolutely necessary to refer back to the other clauses.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON hoped the noble Earl would not press his Amendment. He believed that all the game it was necessary to define was defined within the four corners of the Acts that had been scheduled. One very good reason for their not adopting the Amendment was, that in all likelihood it would tend to limit the definition of the word "game" to the animals therein enumerated; whereas the definition at the present moment was to be in accordance with the definition given to game in the Acts of Parliament which were scheduled.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL also opposed the Amendment. He would point out that as the proposed definition would affect the list of game contained in all the Acts scheduled it would affect all prosecutions arising out of any of those Acts in respect of all animals, as well those that were not enumerated as those that were.

THE EARL OF MINTO said, that as he read the words of the Bill, "game" was to include all that was enumerated in the Schedules of other Acts; but, inasmuch as this was an Act to regulate the relation between landlord and tenants, he could not help thinking that the title of the Bill should be amended so as to correspond with that fact. Why should that fact not be set forth in the title? However, if their Lordships would not support him, he would not persevere any longer in arguing in favour of his Amendment.

On Question? Resolved in the Negative.

THE EARL OF SELKIRK moved an Amendment in Clause 3 (Interpretation Clause) to insert after the word "grass," in the definition of the word "crops," the words "under cultivation," so as to make the clause read, "the word crop shall include grass under cultivation."

The noble Earl said that he moved the Amendment at the request of the noble Duke (the Duke of Buccleuch), who was unable to be in his place to-night. The object of the Amendment was to except the grass land on moors and mountains from the operation of the Bill. It was perfectly clear that the framers of the measure had no intention of extending its provision to the tops of mountains, and to those large districts in which there could be no possible injury done by game. He therefore proposed to insert after the word "grass" the words "land under cultivation,"—unless their Lordships should be of opinion that the object could be better effected by the amendments which had been put on the Paper by the noble Earl (the Earl of Rosebery).

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY suggested that the object of the noble Earl might be better obtained by the adoption of the word "muirland," which was very well known to the Scotch law, rather than by the insertion of the words, "land under cultivation;" because, if they adopted those words, the matter would be left very undefined, seeing that some land might be partly under cultivation and partly muirland, and the adoption of such words would bring the whole of that land under the operation of the Act. With respect to the word "muirland," a very distinct definition of it had been given by Lord Cockburn in a Scotch cause. The object of the noble Duke (the Duke of Buccleuch) being undoubtedly to exclude the moors of Scotland from the scope of the Bill, he thought that if they added the words "except muirland," they would better effect that object than by using the words proposed by the noble Earl.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he did not think the matter one of very great importance, as in all probability the quantity of "grass land under cultivation" on moors would be very small; but a question might arise whether, if the words "land under cultivation" were adopted, it might not be taken to mean land under arable course of cultivation. He believed that the words suggested by the noble Earl (the Earl of Rosebery) were preferable to those suggested by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Selkirk).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he thought the word

"muirland" was preferable to "grass land under cultivation."

Amendment negatived.

Then, on the Motion of the Earl of ROSEBERY, Amendment made; subsection 5 struck out, and the following substituted :—

"5. The word 'crop' shall include 'grass,' whether intended for hay or pasture, except where grown upon muirlands."

THE EARL OF SELKIRK moved an Amendment in Clause 7 (Provisions as to arbitrations for settling claims of damage between lessors and lessees), to leave out the words

("When a lessor and lessee agree in writing to refer to arbitration any claim of damage arising under this Act,") and insert ("In all cases where there is a clause in a lease providing for the settlement of disputes by arbitration, the case shall be at once referred to the arbiter pointed out in the lease; and where no such clause exists in the lease, it shall be competent for a lessor or lessee to refer such claims for compensation to arbitration, in which case")

If the clause were adopted in the present form, there would be two sets of arbitrators—those appointed under the lease, and those appointed under the Act. The effect, therefore, would be to render nugatory the provisions for arbitration under the lease.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY reminded their Lordships that this was a point which had been decided in Committee, and he did not think that any additional reasons had been alleged by the noble Earl to induce them to change the decision at which they then arrived. If the Amendment of the noble Earl was inserted, no one would know under what arbitration disputes with respect to damage by game would come. He thought that it would be better to have one uniform arbitration like that proposed in the Bill.

THE EARL OF SELKIRK said, that the Amendment would certainly be an interference with the principle of arbitration as laid down in the lease.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON ventured to urge upon his noble Friend not to press this Amendment. He quite agreed with him when he said that it was possible that disputes might arise under the lease; but it was equally possible that they might arise outside the lease, and the arbitration now proposed would enable them to dispose of matters which were not contemplated in the lease. If this provision was inserted for the purpose of deciding the way in which all disputes arising out of the lease were to be decided, it was better to confine all decisions to one kind of arbitration. It was perfectly possible that the lease might contain nothing whatever in regard to game, and still it might provide for arbitration of disputes which might arise under the lease; but it could not possibly provide for the settlement of disputes arising outside the lease. In his opinion, the clause as it stood would work better than it would if amended in the manner proposed by the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF SELKIRK repeated, that when in the lease itself there was a clause to the effect that disputes between the parties should be settled in the way which was pointed out by the lease, that was the way in which the parties to the lease had contracted to arbitrate. It was therefore a plain infraction of the principle of freedom of contract to enact that they should be settled in another manner.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that as far as he understood the argument of the noble Earl, it appeared to him that there were some grounds for his Amendment, and he was not at all sure that some change in the clause might not be introduced which, without affecting the general principle of arbitration under the Bill, would carry out his view. He understood the noble Earl to say that the provisions of the Bill would affect leases which were hereafter made. It therefore applied to the future. But landlords and tenants might agree to leave the settlement of any disputes arising under the lease to arbitration as agreed in the lease itself; while disputes arising out of damage done by game might be left to the arbitration proposed by the Bill. He did not suppose the noble Earl who had charge of the measure would object to some such provision being inserted in the Bill.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY reminded the noble and learned Lord that there was already one general provision for arbitration in the Bill, and he thought it would be very inexpedient to introduce a second.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he was quite aware of the provision referred to; but he thought that where the landlord and tenant agreed in the lease to settle disputes arising out of damage done by game, as well as other matters according to terms contained in the lease, there might be a provision enabling them to do so without interfering with the general principle of arbitration contained in the Bill.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL understood the effect of the Amendment of the noble Earl to be, that in leases where there was a general clause for arbitration on matters arising out of the lease, the arbitration should include disputes arising out of the damage caused by game, and that they should not be subject to the special arbitration provided by the Bill. He did not think that there was any objection to the introduction of such a principle into the Bill; but he doubted whether the Amendment proposed would exactly meet the case.

THE EARL OF SELKIRK said, that he would probably be able to suggest some words that would meet the difficulty on the third reading.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

THE EARL OF STAIR moved an Amendment to add Proviso to Clause 6, sub-section 2, (Provisions as to actions of damage between lessor and lessee.)

After ("sterling") add ("Provided always, that the sheriff substitute shall, whenever required to do so by either party, take and record the evidence laid before him, in which case an appeal shall lie to the sheriff, whose judgment shall be final.

The noble Earl said, that by the Bill, as it now stood, the jurisdiction of the Sheriff-substitute, which was now limited to trial of small debts to the amount of £12, would be extended to the trial of disputes between landlords and tenants, often involving very nice and intricate questions, up to £50.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY thought that their Lordships could very well trust the Sheriff's-substitute with the settlement of disputes under this Bill. The main objection which he had to the Amendment was, that whereas the object of the Bill was to render easier the relations between landlords and tenants, this Amendment would tend to increase litigation, by giving a right of appeal from the Court of the Sheriff-substitute to that of the Sheriff.

THE EARL OF STAIR said, this was a point upon which he should feel it necessary to divide the House.

After a short conversation,

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY consented to accept the Amendment.

Words added.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Further Amendments made.

THE EARL OF MINTO moved to insert in the title of the Act, the words—("to regulate the relations between landlords and tenants in respect of damages by Game, and"). The noble Earl said, that the object of the Amendment which he proposed was to make the title more harmonious with the Bill itself, so as to make it intelligible to the people of Scotland at large.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, it was unnecessary to put in further words to express the object of the Bill. Although it was perfectly plain that this would be an Act which would regulate the relations between landlord and tenant, it was not necessary to express that intention in the title.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the object of the noble Earl appeared to be to impress upon the title the idea of the nature of the Bill itself. But that seemed sufficiently done by the short title of the Act—"An Act to amend the Laws relating to Game in Scotland."

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, he had no objection to the addition proposed to the title; but he thought with the noble Duke and the noble and learned Lord that it was unnecessary.

On Question? Resolved in the Negative.

ARMY PROMOTION — THE WARRANT.
QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in the event of the recommendations of the Army Promotion and Retirement Commission being carried out in their entirety, the promotion of the officers of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers will in a short time be from four to six years behind that of the Line; and, if so, will he take steps for such a revision of the scheme as might prevent this injustice being done to the scientific corps?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that he hoped to lay the Warrant which he had prepared, containing the Regulations, on the Table in July, and when they were there the hon. Baronet would find that the recommendations of the Commission had been carried out.

ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND) BILL.
OBSERVATIONS.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I think it may be for the convenience of the Scotch Members if I state the course that the Government wish to take with regard to the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill, which stands second on the list of Orders to-day. The Amendments, a considerable number of which appear on the Paper, are now all before the Government. I therefore propose to commit the Bill pro forma to-day, in order that the Government may take all these Amendments into their consideration, and see what they can accept, and what they will feel bound to oppose.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (IRELAND) (re-committed) BILL.—[BILL 184.]
 (Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 19th June.]

On Question, "That the Preamble be postponed,"

MR. BIGGAR moved that the Chairman should report Progress, in order that the House might proceed to the discussion of the second reading of the County Officers and Courts (Ireland) Bill. There were several reasons why that Bill should be taken first, and not the least was that the number of Judges that would be required under the Judicature Bill must depend upon the County Courts Bill. There was no great need of pressure with regard to the former; but it seemed to be the unanimous opinion of the non-lawyers among the Irish Representatives, that the County Courts Bill was really urgent, in order to provide against the expense and annoyance to which small suitors were put in having to go to the Court of Chancery. He expected to be opposed by the lawyers, because it was their interest to get as much business done in the Superior Courts as possible.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Biggar.)

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING agreed with the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) that it was greatly to be deplored that the Bill was taken before the County Courts Bill. The latter was very much needed, as cases were frequently arising in which great injustice was done to suitors in small cases by the enormous costs involved in actions in the Superior Courts. He did not think it mattered if the Bill did not become law for a year or two, whilst the County Courts Bill was one of pressing importance. He was sure that, if it could be done conveniently, the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland would be disposed to consult the interests of the public and the wishes of Irish Members in this matter.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY denied that there was any foundation for the charge which the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr Biggar) had brought against those Representatives of Ireland who were members of the Bar.

MR. BIGGAR denied that he had made any charge against them. All he said was that, like other people, they were desirous of making as much profit as they could, and he did not suggest in the slightest degree that they were influenced by corrupt motives.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY considered that, to say, that in expressing their opinions upon legal measures, the members of the Irish Bar would be influenced by the chances of fees, as a very direct charge against them. He was not now a practitioner at the Irish Bar, and certainly that charge could not be made against him. The greatest injustice and inconvenience arose from the double proceedings which it was the object of the Judicature Bill to do away with; and though the County Courts Bill might be considered more pressing, nothing was to be gained by obstructing both. Let Irish Members treat the question which should have precedence, as one of great importance and take a division upon it; but let them not waste time in useless discussion, especially after the offer of the Government to send the other Bill to a Select Committee. It would be a serious thing to interfere with the discretion of the Government as to the order in which the measures were set down for discussion.

MR. LAW, while regarding the measure as one of considerable importance, concurred in the suggestion that the difference of opinion as to which was the more pressing matter should be brought to the test of a division. The general sense of the Committee should be ascertained with regard to the Motion, and the minority should yield to the majority.

MR. FAY thought the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar)

was too much enamoured of the County Courts Bill. To give to the County Courts an equitable jurisdiction that would be of any great practical advantage could not be done without large staffs; and that being so, he questioned whether the classes intended to be benefited would find themselves any better for the change. The best way to reach the County Courts Bill was to get through the Judicature Bill as fast as they could, and, in order to do that, he hoped the hon. Member for Cavan would withdraw his Motion, and not obstruct it. The County Courts Bill might easily be considered afterwards.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING wanted to know, whether in case the Judicature Bill was proceeded with, it was intended to prosecute the County Courts Bill with such vigour as the Government could command, with the object, if possible, of passing it into law this Session?

MR. SHAW observed that there was really no opposition to the second reading of the County Courts Bill, and he would urge the Government, therefore, to consent to the Motion to report Progress, in order that the Bill might be sent to the Select Committee without delay.

MR. PARNELL concurred in the suggestion, because if the County Courts Bill was to pass that Session, it was necessary that it should be taken in hand at the earliest moment. He understood that there was some difference of opinion amongst Irish Members in regard to the constitution of the Select Committee, the lawyers wishing it to be so constituted as to make any beneficial result that Session impossible; while there were others who were not lawyers who desired that it might be constituted with power to carry out the work referred to it. In his opinion the County Courts Act should be in operation a year or two before the Judicature Bill passed.

THE CHAIRMAN, calling the hon. Member to Order, pointed out that a discussion of the constitution of the Select Committee was at that stage irrelevant.

THE O'CONOR DON said, all agreed that both Bills should pass; but because some preferred one, and some the other, they were in danger of losing both. He would suggest that they should make what progress they could in Committee on the Judicature Bill, upon the understanding that at the end of the Sitting the Government should move the second reading of the County Courts Bill, with a view to referring it at once to a Select Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) recognized the the fairness of the suggestion of hon. Gentleman the Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don). He (the Attorney General for Ireland) had already stated that the Government were most anxious at the earliest moment to pass the County Courts Bill, and desired to refer it to a Select Committee, with a view to its becoming law this year. Let the Committee go on and make real progress with the Judicature Bill, and then at a quarter to 6, when the debate was adjourned, he would move the second reading of the County Courts Bill, and that it be referred to a Select Committee.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he was not opposed to the County Courts Bill; but he must insist that an opportunity should be afforded for the discussion of its principles before it went to a Select Committee. He wished himself to have the opportunity of expressing his views on it.

MR. SHAW deprecated further discussion on the subject, remarking that if the House set about its business in a practical manner, satisfactory progress might be made with both Bills that day.

MR. P. MARTIN, as a business man, could see no reason why the House should not proceed at once to discuss the Bill. Most of the municipal bodies in Ireland earnestly desired that the Judicature Bill should be passed. No doubt, the County Courts Bill had been delayed, but surely that was no reason why the measure now under consideration should be delayed also. So far from Irish barristers being opposed to the County Courts Bill, they were the first to urge the reform which it was intended to carry out. Though he was anxious to spare the time of the House as much as possible, he could not, as a County Member, assent to the second reading of the County Courts Bill without a discussion of its principles.

MR. BIGGAR said, the County Courts Bill had never been explained to the House, neither had the Judicature Bill.

MR. PARNELL said, that the Irish lawyers evidently desired to pass the Bill without discussion, and he hoped that the County Courts Bill would be taken first. He would therefore oppose any further progress with the Bill under discussion in the interests of his constituents. He should not talk on the County Courts Bill; but he should have a good deal to say on the Judicature Bill.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, the Judicature Bill had already been fully explained on its introduction. On the other hand, the County Courts Bill had been brought forward so long ago as February last. There had been no explanation of its provisions, and it was impossible that it could pass the second reading without a full discussion.

Question put.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, if Progress was reported at 5 o'clock, the difficulty would be solved, and then the County Courts Bill could be taken.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, that, although extremely anxious to make Progress with the Bill, he was equally anxious not to waste the time of the House, and to consult the wishes of hon. Members. He would therefore accept the suggestion of the right hon. and learned Baronet opposite, on condition that this Bill met with a fair discussion, and then at 5 o'clock he would proceed with the County Courts Bill, which he was sure would also meet with a fair discussion.

MR. BIGGAR said, he never heard anything but a fair discussion of the Bill. The object seemed to be to push the Bill through without discussion.

MR. PARNELL did not understand what the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary meant by "a fair discussion." He was prepared to discuss the Bill "fairly." He objected to its passing until, say, a couple of years had elapsed after the County Courts Bill was passed.

MR. SHAW hoped there would be no real obstruction. Whoever obstructed now, after the promise of the Government, on their heads be it.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: The right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary talks about fair discussion and about obstruction. He should remember that on Tuesday last the House was counted out at 9 o'clock on a discussion upon a Resolution brought forward by an Irish Member, the right hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Clare.

MR. PARNELL said, he did not think the reform contemplated by the measure was sufficiently extensive. For years past it had been asserted that the Irish Judicial Bench was over-manned, over-paid, and under-worked. In 1866 there were 12 Irish and 15 English Judges, but there was a very small proportion of judicial work in Ireland compared with that in England. The number of writs, of judgments signed, of defences filed, and of prisoners tried in Ireland was in about the proportion of one sixth, as regarded England. That being so, he objected to the Bill, because it did not provide a sufficient reduction, either in the number of the Irish Judges, or of their salaries. It was true that the salaries of the Irish Judges were, perhaps, 40 or 45 per cent less than the salaries paid to the English Judges; but then, in the payment of salaries, regard should be had to the average emoluments earned by that portion of the Profession from which Judges were taken, and the emoluments earned by Irish barristers were very much less than those earned by English barristers of the same standing. Very few Irish barristers earned more than £1,500 or £2,000 a-year, whilst the average earnings of English barristers was probably £6,000 or £7,000 a-year, and they usually sacrificed a considerable sum when they obtained a seat on the Bench. Owing to the system pursued in Ireland, it had been found necessary to provide places for barristers and to pay them more highly than they would otherwise be paid. Ever since the Union, therefore, members of the Irish Bar had been more or less devoted to the interests of the English Government, and more or less unmindful of the interests of their own country. The result was, that in recent years it had been very difficult for Irish barristers, with some remarkable exceptions, to obtain the suffrages of Irish constituencies. He thought it was a great evil, and one that ought to be pointed out, that County Court Judges should be overpaid. He had wished that the Bill could have been postponed until the County Courts Bill had been in operation for a time, so that it would then be found how many Judges were necessary to perform the work, and how they ought to be paid. For instance, the duties of the Landed Estates Court had been performed by Judge Flanagan much to the satisfaction of the suitors, and that distinguished Judge had himself stated publicly that he was quite competent to do all the work of the Court. But, nevertheless, a second Judge had been appointed to the Landed Estates Court, and that second Judge formed part of the scheme of that Bill. Those two Judges, for performing the work which one formerly did for £3,000 a-year, were to receive £3,500 each. He hoped that proper explanations would be given on that and other points by the Government.

MR. BIGGAR complained that the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland did not seem inclined to answer the hon. Member for Meath's observations.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) thought that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), in his criticisms, had lost sight of the substantial reduction in the Judicial establishment already effected, and the further reductions which would be gradually brought about by the operations of the Bill. There was a vacant Judgeship at present in the Court of Common Pleas which would not be filled up, by which there would be a saving of £3,600 a-year at once. It was also proposed that, on the first vacancy occurring in a Puisne Judgeship of the Court of Exchequer, it would not be filled up, whereby another £3,600 would be saved. It was also contemplated that the next vacancy in the Admiralty Court should not be filled up. The same remark applied to the Receiver Master's office, on which a further saving of £2,500 would be effected when a vacancy occurred. With regard to the Landed Estates Court, when a vacancy by death or resignation occurred, it was proposed that it should not be filled up without an opportunity being given for ascertaining by a Royal Commission whether the appointment of a successor was required. Therefore, he thought it would be seen that the Bill provided reasonable safeguards against wasteful expenditure of the public money. As to the payment of the Judges, it would not do to degrade the Judicial establishments of a country like Ireland, so long as she had a separate system. They must give, he did not say extravagant, but adequate salaries to secure the services of men of independence, and to enable them to maintain the dignity suitable to their high office. He repudiated, on the part of the Government, the idea of keeping up a single unnecessary Judge; but they thought, after careful examination, that the gradual striking off of four Judges was as far as, with a due regard to the public interests, they could fairly carry those reductions. The Judges of the High Court were to have a uniform salary of £3,500—a reduction of under £200 a-year on the pay of the existing Judges. Once they put Judges on the High Court, it was thought only reasonable that they should be remunerated on the same scale as the other Judges of that tribunal. The Judges of the Landed Estates Court were, therefore, to receive £500 additional; but that was not all sheer increase of expenditure, because part of the sum was met by savings from other changes; and, moreover, that extra £500 to the Judges of the Landed Estates Court was balanced by the fact that they would be compelled under that Bill to take their full share of the work in the Chancery Division of the High Court, about the most important jurisdiction of the country. Moreover, the Judges of the Landed Estates Court would have cast on them the arduous duty previously discharged by the Receiver Master; and they would also have to take their share of Circuit work. As to the appointment of the second Judge in the Landed Estates Court, he agreed that Judge Flanagan had most admirably presided over that tribunal; but that learned Judge had, from his exceptional experience, possessed extraordinary efficiency. The Incorporated Society of Attorneys and Solicitors of Ireland—a body most competent to form an opinion as to the state of business in that Court—had memorialized the Government again and again, urging the necessity of appointing a second Judge of the Landed Estates Court. He believed that the Bill, by abolishing and consolidating offices, would, in a very short time, effect a saving to the country of some thousands a-year.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he regretted that the state of his health had prevented him from taking the part in the discussion of the Bill which he had promised himself. It was always invidious to undertake personal criticism of officials; but he deliberately asserted, that if there be an Irish Greville, whose memoirs were to be published 50 years hence, the revelations made in that volume in reference to the behind-the-scenes history of the recent appointment in the Landed Estates Court would astonish those who read them. That appointment he had no hesitation in saying was one of the worst transactions that had taken place with regard to the Irish Judicature system that he had known for 40 years. It was notorious that Mr. Ormsby was appointed, not because he was wanted in the Landed Estates Court, but because his position as a Law Officer of the Crown was required for some one else. The late Viceroy of Ireland (Lord Spencer), to whose zeal and honesty regarding patronage in Ireland every Irishman must pay a just tribute, had succeeded in preventing the appointment of the second Judge to a Court where one Judge was amply sufficient; but the present Government had hardly come into office, when they gave way on the point, although they knew, as a matter of fact, that the one existing Judge was able and willing to do all the work. The salary involved was a trifle, but the principle was one which he could not help deploring. The right hon. and learned Attorney General said it was essential to give the Judges salaries which would enable them to fully support their dignity. That was right; but, at the same time, it was possible to make them too high in proportion to the earnings of the barristers. In Ireland the salary of a Judge was nearly twice as large as the average emoluments of the first 20 or 30 men at the Bar, and therefore “the Bench, the Bench, the Bench”—something from the Government—was the aim and object of every man who went to the Irish Bar; and so vast was the number of legal appointments, large and small, that there was a place of some kind for one man out of every three or four at the Bar. He might be told that he was not acting in a patriotic spirit, and that he ought to try and get as much as possible for Ireland out of the Consolidated Fund; but he maintained that if the Judges were overpaid, that money was money which a patriotic Irishman ought not to defend, but ought to deprecate. He denied that there was any necessity for appointing another

Judge in the Landed Estates Court, and gave the Government credit for their desire to bring justice to the door of the poor man by introducing the County Courts Bill, which ought to be passed first, and in favour of which there was a general concurrence of opinion in Ireland. He should support the Judicature Bill, as far as it went in cutting down the overmanning of the Bench, and that enormous multiplication of legal offices, which was detrimental to the best interests of the country and fatal to the independence of a noble Profession which in former days had contributed some of the brightest pages to the history of their country.

MR. BIGGAR said, he took a different view of the measure from that taken by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) and the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan). He thought the parallel between the English and Irish Judicial Staff was not a very happy one, for as regarded England, the number of Judges in that country was generally alleged to be quite inadequate for the business done. Besides, if the taxpayers did not object, it was much better to have too many Judges than too few. He considered it was only right that a Judge should get a larger sum than a first-class man earned by practice at the Bar; and in his idea, the desire prevalent in the Irish Bar to obtain a Government appointment was a legitimate one. This Bill was in some respects very peculiar; for, in a great many cases, it stipulated that no change should be made. He did not see the object of introducing a Bill if it was to make no change. It, no doubt, had some good points; but it was very defective in others, and, in his opinion, it ought not to pass in its present shape. He objected to the Judges having authority to make rules, and to the Government having the power of fixing salaries. That House should hold fast by its own authority and its own dignity, rather than delegate such extreme powers to the Courts below.

Question, "That the Preamble be postponed," put, and agreed to.

Clauses 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Union of existing Courts into one Supreme Court of Judicature).

MR. SHAW moved as an Amendment, in page 4, line 3, after "court" to insert "and the Bankruptcy Court." He understood that on a former occasion it had been intended to facilitate the Bankruptcy business. At present an immense amount of costs were accumulated in Bankruptcy cases, owing to the fact that they had to be adjudicated in Dublin and wound up there. He thought this evil would be avoided by the appointment of local Bankruptcy Courts.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) pointed out that this appointment of local Bankruptcy Courts would not be facilitated by the Amendment. But the present constitution of, and the members employed in, the Irish Bankruptcy Courts were engaging the attention of the Government, and they hoped to legislate on the subject next Session. For that reason, amongst others, it had not been deemed desirable to include them in the present Bill, as forming a part of the High Court of Justice.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (Constitution of High Court of Justice in Ireland).

MR. MELDON moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, line 26, after "heretofore," to insert—

"except that no future Lord Chancellor shall be appointed, unless he shall be of fifteen years' standing at least at the Bar of Ireland."

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 26, after the word "heretofore," to insert the words "except that no future Lord Chancellor shall be appointed unless he shall be of fifteen years' standing at least at the Bar of Ireland."—(Mr. Meldon.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) hoped the Amendment would not be pressed. He could not see why the Lord Chancellorship for Ireland should be absolutely restricted to a member of the Irish Bar, seeing that there was nothing to prevent a member of the Bar in Ireland being Lord Chancellor in this country, and that in fact the present Lord Chancellor of England was a distinguished Irishman. The Irish Lord Chancellorship had been held by Lord Campbell, Lord St. Leonards, and other distinguished English lawyers with great advantage, and it would not be desirable to limit the area of selection for the office, as proposed. It had been found in the past that the Executive, in filling the post, had fairly considered the claims of the Irish Bar. It was very undesirable to lay down a hard-and-fast line in this matter, as it might have the effect on some occasions of preventing Ireland from having the services, as Lord Chancellors, of the men best fitted for the position.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, on the contrary, hoped the Amendment would be pressed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said there was nothing to prevent the appointment of a member of the Irish Bar to the post of Lord Chancellor of England, but he (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) would like to see it attempted. There was no reason why the Irish Lord Chancellor should not, like the other Irish Judges, be regarded to belong to the Irish Bar. With reference to the appointment of Lord Campbell as Lord Chancellor of Ireland, he must observe that that noble and learned Lord never held a brief in a Court of Equity, and great indignation was felt in Ireland on the subject. The members of the junior Bar held a meeting, and protested strongly against the appointment; but, unfortunately, they were not supported by the seniors, who did not like to set themselves in opposition to the authorities.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN observed that if the provision which the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) wished to introduce had always been the law, Ireland would have lost the services of three of the most distinguished men who had ever held the office of Lord Chancellor—namely, Lord Campbell, Lord Redesdale, and Lord St. Leonards. At the same time, he thought the head of the Irish Bench ought to be a member of the Irish Bar, and successive Governments had acted on that principle, for the last six Chancellors were Irish barristers.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that the right hon. and learned Attorney General had said there was nothing in the Bill which prevented the appointment, as English Lord Chancellor, of an Irish barrister, but the fact was that no such appointment had ever been made. Neither were they appointed to other offices, in instance of which he would refer to the appointment of Lord Plunket as Master of the Rolls in England, which appointment had to be cancelled on account of the opposition of the English Bar. With reference to the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Denbigh (Mr. Osborne Morgan), as to the advantages which Ireland was supposed to have derived from the services of Lords Redesdale, St. Leonards, and other Englishmen, as a matter of fact, the law was quite as well administered by the Irish Lord Chancellors who had succeeded them—such men as Sir Maziere Brady, Mr. Blackburn, and Dr. Ball. It was most important that the Irish Lord Chancellor should be an experienced member of the Irish Bar. They had, for example, a code of Land Laws widely differing from that of England, and the President of the Ultimate Court of Appeal for Land Law Causes was the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. The only thing he would suggest to the hon. and learned Member for Kildare was that, if the Amendment was to be adopted in its present form, they might deprive themselves of the advantages to be derived from the appointment of an Equity Judge to the highest judicial office. He further thought that the Amendment would be improved if 10 years' standing at the Bar was substituted for 15 years.

Amendment amended, by leaving out the word "fifteen," and inserting the word "ten."

Question put,

"That the words 'except that no future Lord Chancellor shall be appointed unless he shall be of ten years' standing at least at the Bar of Ireland' be there inserted."

On the Motion of Mr. PARNELL (for Mr. Butt), Amendment made in page 4, line 29, at end, by adding—

"And shall be appointed in the same manner in which the puisne justices and junior barons of the superior courts of common law in England were appointed before the passing of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873."

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

COUNTY OFFICERS AND COURTS (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 67.]

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, the subject was one of great importance to Ireland. The present Bill had been introduced so far back as February 12th. No one intimated any opposition to the second reading, with the exception of a formal Notice to prevent its being taken up after midnight from the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell). Still, although there was no opposition to the second reading, the Government neither took the stage, nor did they intimate their willingness to refer it to a Select Committee, as he had proposed. No intimation had been made by the Government as to the course they would pursue; but that day they had stated that they would have no objection to read it a second time pro forma, and refer it to a Select Committee. It was, he thought, rather too late to take that course now. If his proposal had been accepted three months ago, the Committee might have met and agreed to a Bill which would have met with the approval of the House. He feared it was now too late; but as many hon. Members around him were desirous that the Bill should be read a second time, he deferred to their opinion, and would content himself with stating his objections to the Bill in general, and if it should be read a second time, would move that it be referred to a Select Committee, with special instructions to amend it on the points to which he objected, and which were enumerated in his Motion. He thought, however, it would be inexpedient to read it a second time under those conditions without having some discussion on the provisions. The objects of the Bill were four-fold. It proposed, firstly, to amalgamate the offices of the Clerk of the Crown and Clerk of the Peace. He agreed to that as a good object; but he objected to the manner in which it was proposed to carry it out. The second object was to reduce the number of Chairmen from 33 to 21. To that he did not object, but he opposed the manner in which it was carried out. The third object of the Bill was to extend the jurisdiction of the Chairmen of the counties, which was well enough in itself, but badly carried out. The last object of the Bill was to prevent them from practising at the Bar. That was the only part of the Bill to which he objected; and he admitted that it was a point that could be discussed in Committee. With regard to the first point, the Bill would abolish the old Common Law tenure of office by the Clerks of the Crown and of the Peace, and the new official would hold his office, not as at present by good behaviour, but during the pleasure of the Lord Lieutenant. He would, as a matter of fact, be put upon the footing of a mere Civil Servant, a proceeding which he thought very objectionable, and he must contend that the old condition of tenure should be preserved. It was also objectionable that any future holder of the office should be subject to a Treasury certificate of his fitness for the post. The Treasury could know nothing about the fitness of a man for the office of Clerk of the Crown and of the Peace in Ireland. Then it was also objectionable that the salaries of these officers should be left to be fixed, not by the Bill, but by the Treasury dealing with the duties performed. The result of that would be that in one county a Clerk of the Peace and of the Crown would receive one salary, and in another county a different one. Then, although it might be right to reduce the number of Chairmen by amalgamating counties together, the amalgamation should be carried out by the Bill itself, and should not be left to be carried out by the Lord Lieutenant in Council, a mode of procedure which was certain to lead to jobbery and favouritism of all descriptions. The Bill ought also to contain a Schedule of the counties proposed to be amalgamated. To that part of the Bill which proposed to extend the Common Law jurisdiction of the County Courts from £40 to £50, the only objection he had was that the jurisdiction was not extended to £100. He approved of the proposal of the Bill to confer Equity jurisdiction upon the Chairman in 11 different matters or classes enumerated in the Bill; but he complained that while they were taking steps to bring justice home to the doors of the people in regard to the first trial of causes, there should be no appeal except to the Lord Chancellor sitting in Dublin. He considered that the appeal in every case should be heard in the county where the cause was originally tried, which could be done by the Master of the Rolls and the Vice Chancellor going circuit for the purpose. He thought it also most objectionable that the stamp duties to be levied under the Bill should not be settled by the Bill; but, perhaps, the most extraordinary part of the measure was that which provided that the salaries of the Chairmen of Counties should be fixed, not by the Bill itself, but by the Lord Chancellor and the Lords of the Treasury. This was a proposal to which he should object. There were several other points to which he might have referred, but he refrained from doing so, as he had no desire to obstruct the progress of the measure. He must, however, say that those to which he had adverted were well worthy of the attention of a Select Committee.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, that he was not opposed to the amalgamation of the offices of Clerks of the Crown and the Peace, if efficiency would be secured, and at the same time justice done to the holders of these offices. The officers in question were at present called upon, under pain of their removal by the Lord Lieutenant, to perform duties never contemplated when they were appointed. This would be unfair to officers, many of whom were appointed 20 or 30 years' ago. The present occupiers of office should be permitted to retire on a good salary, and their successors might be appointed on any terms which might be considered necessary. With regard to the conferring Equity jurisdiction on the Chairmen of Counties, he did not object to the measure; but he wished to point out that great injustice would be done to the suitors if the Chairmen were not provided with sufficient Staffs of officers. As to increasing the number of Judges, he urged the necessity of its being in the Bill. The Treasury might induce some of the Judges to retire on a competent pension. The discussion of the mode of amalgamation would be of advantage, and they would receive suggestions from the people interested in the country. The whole matter should be done openly, and then all questions of favouritism would be removed. The amount of the jurisdiction at present was £40, and the proposal was to increase it to £100. £100 was a serious sum for Ireland, and he believed in these cases the parties would prefer going to a Superior Court. And then they must take into consideration the costs of a panel; for it should be remembered that questions of account, of administration, of partnership, and the like, though affecting small amounts of money, might involve points of law as abstruse and as difficult as in cases where thousands of pounds were at stake. In those cases, the costs would be very great. He thought it would be better to have the appeal to the Court of Chancery. He must further urge, in conclusion, the advantage of setting forth in the Bill the mode in which it was proposed the County Courts should be consolidated.

MR. MORRIS pointed out that the Bill proposed to abolish the Recordship of Galway, which was a very ancient office. The Recorders of Galway and Derry were in future to be called County Court Judges, or something of that sort. He did not see why they should not bear the name of Recorders of Galway and Derry. There was an ancient historic interest in the Recordship of Galway, and something might be done in the way of preserving the title of the office, even if the duties were merged in the manner proposed.

MR. FAY said, he did not see much in the Bill, except that it seemed to create offices for hon. and learned Gentlemen on the other side of the House. The unfortunate County Court Judge, with £1,000 a-year, was to have everything under his jurisdiction, from dealing with divorces to matters of account. The cattle dealers of Ireland often disputed over matters of account; but it would be unfortunate to have such a Judge dealing with their cases. If this Judge was to do this work properly, he ought to have an immense Staff; and if that was so, the unfortunate suitor would have tremendous sums to pay in fees, and would find the procedure more expensive than the Courts in Dublin. This Bill abolished Chairmen of Sessions who were practising as barristers, and well up in all the latest cases, and he could affirm that they were very popular in Ireland. He was opposed to the Bill. As to its being cheap, his opinion was that cheap things were generally the dearest, and he thought that this cheap law would turn out to be very dear law. He hoped that if they had a Committee on the Bill, they would appoint gentlemen well acquainted with the legal offices, who could advise upon the subject, and who had all the experience which the practice of the law could give them.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING supported the Bill. He thought there had been too many objections to what he would call the poor man's Court. This Bill had been thought of for years, and the necessity for it was well understood in Ireland. They were bound to bring justice home to the poor man's door. That was the professed object of this Bill; and, if he had the honour of being elected a Member of the Select Committee, he would do his best to make it effective for that purpose. He would not go into details, because that was a matter for the Committee. He objected to, for instance, raising the jurisdiction from £40 to £100. The further power given in the Bill would bring justice to the poor; but the alteration would compel that man to go to Dublin to obtain justice. The jurisdiction stopped at a farm of the annual value of £30; but the House should remember that a farm of that value in Ulster was very different from a farm £30 in value in Munster. He was sorry to see that the Bill had had the Equity jurisdiction reduced from £500 in the Bill of last year to £300, and he could not see why the change had been made. He should therefore propose an Amendment, to render it more in conformity with the Bill of last year. As to the officers, the Bill would certainly be unworkable with the present proposals. There would have to be a Registrar in connection with the Court, or otherwise the Circuits would never be gone through.

MR. LAW said, he would not go into details, but he might say that he understood the chief object of the Bill was to give an Equity jurisdiction to the County Court Judges in Ireland equal to that which had for some years been exercised by the English County Court Judges. He must say, however, that he more than doubted whether this Equity jurisdiction could be efficiently worked by the Irish chairmen with only the official assistance which the Bill provided. It was proposed that one man should act as Clerk of the Crown, Clerk of the Peace, and Registrar of the Civil Bill Court; that was to say, they allowed one-third of a man to do the official work of a County Court in Ireland, whilst they had several competent individuals to do similar work in England. He entirely agreed with what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member who had just spoken, and hoped that the measure would be so amended as to render it acceptable and beneficial to the great body of the people of Ireland.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, while taking exception to some of the details of the Bill, would give it a general support. He trusted the Government would give a local Admiralty jurisdiction to two or three large towns in Ireland—to Limerick, Waterford, and, perhaps, some others. The Bill would not, in his opinion, lead to such an increase of officers as was suspected; and he hoped that where there were found men occupying the position of Deputy Clerks of the Peace the assistance of these officers of experience would be secured, and their rights, which were almost vested, recognized.

MR. MELDON said, upon the understanding that the Bill upon being read a second time was to be referred to a Select Committee, and that the House would hereafter have a full opportunity of discussing the Bill, he would not enter into a discussion of its provisions. But he thought it was futile to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, who without the consent of the Treasury could not provide for the appointment of additional officers. He considered an extended County Court jurisdiction for Ireland absolutely necessary, and regretted that such a measure had been so long delayed.

CAPTAIN NOLAN complained that the Government had rolled up several distinct subjects in one Bill, and had in consequence put Irish Members in the dilemma of either rejecting all, or accepting all. Against that he protested. He was afraid the measure would place a great deal of patronage at the disposal of the Government, and pressed the Government to keep up the office of the Recorder of Galway.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, the course of the discussion was very satisfactory, in that it had shown the confidence which was felt in the distinguished position of the County Court Judges, and he trusted that under the more important jurisdiction to be conferred upon them by the Bill that confidence would continue. For his own part, he did not anticipate there would be any of that substantial increase of patronage hinted at, and he was at a loss to understand, looking over the surface of the Bill, what prospect there was for suspecting it. The 33 Chairmen were to be cut down to 21; and at present there were two important officers—the Clerk of the Crown and the Clerk of the Peace—these were to be cut down to 32, so that, indeed, instead of there being more there was less scope for patronage. It was not contemplated there should be any immediate resignation of county officers; but from time to time, from inclination, age, or infirmity, they might take advantage of the provisions of the Act. The various observations which had been made upon the increased jurisdiction provided in the Bill showed the advantage there would be in asking the House, as he intended, to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. Those observations would receive the utmost attention; and he would say, on the part of the Government and of the Treasury, that they had no wish to withdraw the Bill from the most searching examination and careful consideration upstairs. In reference to the observations as to a sufficient Staff, this Bill contained a clause not found in any previous Bill on the question, and there was every desire on the part of the Government and the Treasury to give a fair working Staff. The 8th clause provided that the Lord Chancellor, with the consent of the Treasury, could add additional Registrars where they were found necessary. Without committing himself to the figures, he might say there would be a very considerable saving in public expense by the passing of the Bill.

RUSSIA—HON. COLONEL WELLESLEY, MILITARY ATTACHE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD DORCHESTER rose to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which he had given private Notice—namely, Whether there is any truth in the report of the marked discourtesy with which Lieut.-Colonel the Hon. Frederick Wellesley, of Her Majesty's Coldstream Guards, when in discharge of his duty as Military Attaché to the British Embassy at St. Petersburg, has been treated by His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Nicholas, commanding the Army in Roumania of Her Majesty's ally the Emperor of Russia, or by his orders; and, if so, to ask what steps have in consequence been taken by Her Majesty's Government; and to move for the production of any communications upon the subject to be laid before this House. The noble Lord said it was not his wish to interfere with the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government, characterized as they had been with the utmost discretion, and he believed with firmness; but when it became a matter of notoriety that an officer of high rank in Her Majesty's Forces had been openly insulted by the Commander of a foreign Army, he thought it incumbent that the people of this country should receive some explanation of the circumstance. When officers from Italy and Germany were encouraged to proceed to the front with the Russian Army it appeared to him to be a great reflection upon a British officer that he should be received in the manner in which Colonel Wellesley was; indeed, he could not, for a long time, believe that it was possible that a British officer should have been received and spoken to in the way in which that gallant officer was said to have been received and spoken to. Colonel Wellesley was the Military Attaché of Her Majesty's Embassy at St. Petersburg, and as such was encouraged by the Russian authorities to go to the front; but on arriving there he was received by the Grand Duke Nicholas in a manner the like of which he had never heard before. Nothing, he was sure, but the strict discipline of his early education, and that courteous manner with which all his friends knew him to be specially gifted, would have induced Colonel Wellesley to bear with the affront which it appeared had been offered to him. Colonel Wellesley was stated to have felt the reproof so strongly that he at once doffed his military uniform, put on plain clothes, and retired to Bucharest, whence he applied to superior authority for further instructions and orders. Those orders he had received, and His Imperial Majesty had placed him on his personal Staff. But he (Lord Dorchester) would submit to their Lordships that the position of being on the personal staff of the Emperor, and in the rear of the Army, was by no means the same as that of being in the front. If the report which had reached this country was correct, he desired to ask the noble Earl what steps have in consequence been taken by Her Majesty's Government, and also to move for the production of any communications which might have passed upon the subject.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I am quite willing to give to your Lordships whatever information I possess relative to the affair to which the Question of the noble Lord refers. It is the fact that Colonel Wellesley presented himself at the head-quarters of the Grand Duke Nicholas upon the invitation of the Emperor himself; and that he was received by the Grand Duke in a manner certainly not marked with that courtesy which one would expect to be shown by an officer of his high position towards a foreign gentleman and officer who was specially commended to him. My Lords, I can only say as to that part of the matter, that so far as the conduct of Colonel Wellesley is concerned he seems to have acted with that good temper and good sense which, from his antecedents and his character, I should expect. I received the first intimation of this occurrence by telegraph. It was not accompanied with sufficient details to enable me to take any steps; but as soon as I received a letter from Colonel Wellesley, three or four days ago, giving fuller details of what had passed, I immediately communicated in a private form with the Russian Ambassador in this country. I told him exactly what had been represented to me. He thereupon communicated with his Government; and the result of that communication was that a reply has been received from him, the tenor of which leads me to hope and to believe that this unpleasantness will be got rid of, and that the incident will be settled in a perfectly satisfactory manner. Probably your Lordships will not wish that I should go farther into the matter—and I am quite sure your Lordships will see that, the matter being in the position I have stated, it would be useless, and for obvious reasons undesirable, that any Correspondence should be laid on the Table—even if there were any Correspondence of an official character—which up to the present moment is not the case.

TREATIES OF PARIS, 1856.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

LORD CAMPBELL, in rising to move—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for extracts of any correspondence which has taken place since the 24th of April between Her Majesty’s Government and other Powers as to the manner of fulfilling their engagements under the Treaties of Paris of 1856,” said: My Lords, the terms of the Notice I have given will explain the kind of information which it calls for. Such information would put an end to many doubts in reference to the existing war, and the intentions of the Government upon it. It would tend to show whether the three Powers—Austria, Germany, and Russia—are still acting together, or whether a less suspected European concert is attainable. It might throw light on the extraordinary statement which has appeared to-day, that Austrian troops are concentrating in Dalmatia, not for the defence, but the dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire. But I admit at once it was not merely with a view to information that I gave the Notice. My intention was to bring before your Lordships many thoughts as to the efforts which it seems to me our Eastern policy requires. In the meanwhile, it has been credibly affirmed that Her Majesty’s Government are to-day appealing to the other House of Parliament upon the subject. Under these circumstances, it is not the time to urge them when they seem to be decided; or to uphold their measure when we do not know exactly what has been propounded. In common with large numbers who have at heart the maintenance of Treaties, the improvement of the Ottoman Empire, and the deliverance of Europe from the unfortunate aggression which hangs over it, I should only venture to congratulate them on the judgment they have formed, or on the step at least which is imputed to them. Other noble Lords can address the House in a different sense, or at greater length, as a Motion is before it. Should no such correspondence as I allude to have begun, or should it still be incomplete, the Motion may be easily disposed of. It is true that two despatches of an important kind have recently appeared. But it would be satisfactory to know that Russia is not the only Power to which the views of the Government have lately been communicated.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for extracts of any correspondence which has taken place since the 24th of April between Her Majesty’s Government and other Powers as to the manner of fulfilling their engagements under the Treaties of Paris of 1856.—(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

THE EARL OF DERBY: The reticence of my noble Friend will be my best excuse for not entering into this matter. The noble Lord has addressed you very briefly, and I do not think you will expect from me explanations which, in point of fact, he has not asked for.

Within the last four or five days we have laid on the Table of this and the other House of Parliament two despatches, containing a statement which I think will be considered sufficiently full and explicit of the views which Her Majesty's Government take of the present situation. I shall, therefore, imitate the discretion of my noble Friend in regard to the Motion, and give the only Answer to this Question which it is possible to give, which is, to say that as there are no Papers it will not be in my power to produce them.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he did not propose to take any part in this discussion, but he wished to reserve to himself the right to make any comments upon the despatches recently produced which he thought desirable.

LORD CAMPBELL said, that after the statement of the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary, he should be entitled to withdraw the Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

REPORT OF THE AMENDMENTS.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order of the Day for the further consideration of the Report of Amendments, read.

Moved, "That the said Order be discharged."—(The Lord President.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, perhaps I may be allowed to express a hope respecting this matter. Those who supported the noble Earl behind me (the Earl of Harrowby) know and feel that no one can have so much opportunity of judging of the opinion of the country on this matter as Her Majesty's Government—especially as they have been addressed by large bodies of persons, as I understand. Everyone who knows what the nature of such a question is and how great the delicacy with which it ought to be treated, will acquiesce, I suppose, in the absolute propriety of not forcing upon any parties a decision which might leave in their minds a rankling and uneasy feeling that their earnest protests in favour of their rights have not been attended to. Therefore, my Lords, fully acquiescing in the absolute necessity of postponing this measure, as Her Majesty's Government have thought it right to do, I rise principally with the view of expressing a most earnest hope that during the six or nine months which must elapse before this measure can appear again before your Lordships, it will be calmly considered by all those who have to do with this question out-of-doors. We know that there are professional agitators who live and thrive upon questions of this kind; and it is always impossible to prevent an agitation arising on such questions in which the real merits of so difficult and delicate a subject are lost sight of. As regards your Lordships' own House, this matter has been approached by all parties with an earnest and hearty desire to settle a delicate and most unpleasant question; and I cannot but hope and believe that during the months that are before us neither the Clergy nor the Laity—neither the defenders of our ancient institutions on the one hand, nor those who are determined to do their best to obtain more freedom in this matter for our Dissenting brethren—will lose sight of the duty of treating this question in the same calm and temperate way in which it has been treated by your Lordships' House. I may be excused, perhaps, if I state shortly what I believe to be the position of the question as it now stands before the country. Your Lordships' House, which certainly may be taken to represent as well as any other body in the Kingdom the opinions of the Laity of the Church of England, and which certainly is not likely to forget any dangers which may threaten the Established Church, has by a considerable majority recorded its opinion that this question ought to be settled, and settled in a particular direction. I take it that the calm decision of this body must have great weight with all who are interested in this matter. The Clergy are fully entitled to be heard on their side of the question, and it was the endeavour of myself and of my most rev. Brother (the Archbishop of York), in the course of the recent debate, to suggest certain changes in the law which we thought would be acceptable to the Clergy generally, and which I still believe must be embodied in any measure which may be proposed for the final settlement of the burial question in the next Session of Parliament. The two matters to which we venture to draw the attention of the Clergy are these—that a large number of Dissenters are at present incapable of being buried with religious rites by the Clergy of the Church of England, and that they are in most instances desirous of being buried by their own ministers with such religious rites as have been suggested. To meet this difficulty I ventured to propose an Amendment to the Bill, and with the view of meeting another and a different difficulty, my most rev. Brother proposed another Amendment, which it was very difficult to formulate, and which, after two careful considerations of it, your Lordships determined not to accept in the form in which it was proposed. But it is my belief that when this question comes to be settled full consideration must be given to the difficulty which my most rev. Brother has brought under your Lordships' notice; and that it will never do in conceding to our Dissenting brethren some rights which they have not hitherto possessed to leave the Clergy in a disadvantageous position with reference to the indiscriminate burial of all persons, whatever may be their character and whatever may be the circumstances of their death. I am most anxious that the Clergy of the Church of England during the interval which the decision of the Ministry has procured for them should consider this matter in that spirit of kindly Christian charity which is the best ornament of their profession.

LORD DENMAN said, that the Amendments of the most rev. Prelate and of the noble Earl (the Earl of Harrowby) were quite at variance with each other. He would wish to see leading Dissenters meet Churchmen and agree upon some form of burial service; but the Amendment of the most rev. Prelate was quite indefinite, and looked for approbation by the Bishop perhaps nearly seven days after a service might have been performed. As to the Amendment of the noble Earl (the Earl of Harrowby), which was brought on a second time—after rejection—in a most unusual manner, under it, a friend or enemy of the deceased, having charge of his funeral, might dispense with any religious service, or introduce any religious service to be performed by a layman in a churchyard. He (Lord Denman) regretted extremely that the vantage ground obtained by this Bill having been read a second time had not helped it forward, and that the same agreement which existed in Scotland and Ireland did not exist in England, and deplored the effect of a difference as to a formality disuniting Parliament at the very time that they ought to show to the world an example of agreement.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, that while he was sorry the Government had not seen fit to adopt the solution of the difficulty embodied in the recent vote of their Lordships, he concurred with the most rev. Primate in hoping that the matter would be discussed during the Recess in a calm and temperate spirit. The subject ought to engage the attention of Convocation, and he sincerely trusted that Body would do all that lay in their power towards the settlement of this delicate and difficult question by suggesting alterations in the Burial Service, such as had been made by the American Episcopal Church, as would render it easy for the clergy to make use of it, without scandal or scruple, in all cases.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE thought the noble Earl's Amendment had failed to provide sufficient security for the protection of the rights of the clergy to their churchyards. He hoped the consideration of the question by the clergy in Convocation, and by the public out-of-doors, would be approached in a calm spirit and with a desire to take such steps as would be best calculated to bring about a satisfactory settlement.

EARL GREY could not refrain from expressing his deep regret that a settlement of this matter should be deferred to another year. The question of burials could not be satisfactorily settled unless means were taken to give perfect liberty of burial in churchyards to members of Dissenting Bodies, and he believed it would be found necessary for this purpose to vest churchyards in a parochial corporation other than the parson. As to relieving the consciences of clergymen, he believed this could not be done by providing alternative services to be used at their discretion, but by some modification of the Burial Service which would enable it to be used without offence over the dead, be they whom they might.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he entirely concurred in the wish which had been expressed that the discussion which was perfectly certain to arise on this question during the next six or nine months might be conducted with calmness and moderation; but he did not think that the course which had been taken by the Government was likely to tend very much to that result. Last Session the Government gave a pledge that they would deal with this subject; and this year they brought forward a Bill of which his noble Friend (the Lord President) said, in introducing it, that it only dealt incidentally with the religious question, and that it had been brought in principally on account of an urgent sanitary want. Instead of pressing the measure forward, however, their Lordships had been informed that in the face of a majority of votes in favour of a proposal which would bring about a satisfactory settlement of the question, the Bill was to be withdrawn. No doubt there might be difficulties in the way of any Bill which reached the House of Commons at this period of the Session; but whose fault was that, so far as this Bill was concerned? There had been no measure of urgency before their Lordships, and yet the Burials Bill had been extended over 15 weeks before they had arrived at the Report of Amendment in Committee. Not only so, but they had not even had a repetition of the pledge which was given last year, that the Government would be fully prepared to deal with the subject next Session. He regretted that after the vote of the other evening—a vote which was not of any mere Denominational or Party character—the Government should not have persevered with their measure.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, the noble Earl (Earl Granville) was under a misapprehension, when he stated that the Government made a pledge last year to deal with what was called the religious difficulty. His impression was that the Government made no such pledge in the absolute sense which the words of his noble Friend were intended to convey. But, while that was the case, and while it was perfectly true that, in introducing the present measure, he laid stress upon the necessity of the Bill in a sanitary point of view, and upon the necessity also of a consolidation of the Burial Acts, the Government had attempted to deal with the religious difficulty by the insertion of clauses which his noble Friend seemed to have entirely forgotten. In this House, however, they had met with an amount of opposition which Her Majesty's Government had not been able successfully to resist. The noble Earl said that this Bill had been 15 weeks before the House, and that there had been great obstruction of Business in the other House of Parliament. The Government were not responsible for what had taken place in regard to the obstruction of Business in the other House of Parliament; but such was the condition of Business in the other House that if this Bill had been sent down there a month ago it would not yet have been brought under consideration. It was not, therefore, correct to cast upon this House the odium of the statement of the noble Earl, which, if it meant anything, meant that the Government had purposely delayed this Bill because they did not want to carry it. He denied the correctness of any such assertion. The Government did honestly endeavour to deal with the question which they had undertaken to bring before Parliament: they had redeemed the pledge which they gave, and had introduced a Bill which they thought and believed would, if carried, have been of advantage to the public. He stated the other night that the Amendment of the noble Earl (the Earl of Harrowby) was so contrary to the scheme of the Government, and would so entirely derange the manner in which the Bill was framed, that they must withdraw the measure; but he also said—and he repeated it to-night—that the question was one of great importance, and that it would receive the careful attention of the Government during the Recess.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL admitted that the noble Duke was not open to the observation that he had not taken great pains to pass a Bill in accordance with the views he had expressed. What was complained of was that Her Majesty's Government had not yielded to the decision which had been arrived at by their Lordships' House. They had that evening received some excellent advice from the most rev. Primate as to the course which should be taken by those who took part in the discussion of the question during the Recess. The most rev. Primate had recommended the greatest calmness, the greatest desire to avoid all irritating topics, and the greatest desire to bring to the consideration of the question a sincere wish to remedy not merely the grievance which their Lordships had admitted to exist, but also to protect the interests of the Established Church. What would most conduce to promote such a temper and frame of mind would, he believed, be an acknowledgment that Her Majesty's Government saw the question in the light in which their Lordships viewed it, and were determined to bring it next year to a final and satisfactory conclusion. They had observed that noble Lords opposite had not seemed very anxious to dispute the views which had been advanced in support of the Amendment of the noble Earl. It was true that the noble Duke had spoken strongly in support of his own views; and the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) had spoken with an amount of caution not always observable in the most powerful and impressive of his speeches, for he stated half-a-dozen times that he was not speaking his own sentiments, but the sentiments of certain memorialists whose views, he thought, ought to be considered by their Lordships. But as to any other Member of the distinguished Bench opposite, he did not know that any one of them had endeavoured to persuade their Lordships to reject that which was the real essence of the Bill. Sanitary questions were no doubt important, but it would perhaps be better to treat them separately from a question of difficulty and delicacy like this. Here was a grievance to be remedied, and the question was, whether it was to be remedied in the manner in which a majority of their Lordships' House had determined in the most significant and decisive manner that it should be remedied. This matter should receive the careful consideration of those who advised the Crown, and who were the trustees of that Church of which the Crown was the head. The welfare of the Church of England was more involved in the amicable and pacific solution of this question than that of any other institution in the country.

Motion agreed to; Order discharged accordingly; and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION (CHURCH BUILDING).

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

EARL NELSON desired to draw attention to the Return to an Order of the House made on the 19th of June, 1876, and moved that it be amended—(1) by the addition of a balance sheet showing the amount of interest received, and the items of expenditure which had apparently reduced the balance by more than £6,000 and interest; (2) by supplying the omission of the amount of population of each district to which grants or nominal grants had been made. The noble Earl had further given Notice to move—

“That in the opinion of this House, the mode adopted for the administration of the balance inherited from the Church Building Commissioners is unsatisfactory, and contrary to the original intention of the Church Building Acts.”

The noble Earl complained of the unsatisfactory manner in which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had carried out the Church Building Acts, and that while, under the old Church Building Acts, the number of free seats had been 61 per cent., under the Ecclesiastical Commissioners the number had been reduced to 44 per cent. The Church Building Acts were kept alive by occasional nominal grants of £5 to churches; but if it were necessary that there should be more pew-rented churches, further legislation ought to be asked for, and it would be undesirable to continue the old Church Building Acts by means of a sham. It was not right that grants should be given to churches that did not require them, and that were built, not out of consideration for the poor, but because the value of property was sometimes raised by the erection of a church in the neighbourhood. If the Act required amendment, let it be amended, and do not let the Church be exposed to hostile criticism from the continuance of these anomalies.

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER, who was most imperfectly heard, submitted that the noble Earl had obtained, or could obtain, all the information which he now asked for from the Report of the Commissioners on the Table, and also that the noble Earl had fallen into several mistakes in quoting from the provisions of the numerous Acts of Parliament which had been passed on the subject. He contended that the Commissioners had acted within their powers, and in accordance with a certain scale where moneys were contributed in allotting free seats. As the balance in hand became lower, the Commissioners were compelled to decrease the amount of the grants. The Acts were carried out in conformity with the recommendations of the Bishop of the diocese, the clergy, and the Churchwardens, and all that the Commissioners had to do was to see that the grants made were fair and reasonable. He did not see any necessity for giving the additional Returns moved for.

EARL NELSON admitted that the Return produced was a most valuable one, and would be useful. He felt very strongly that these old Church Building Acts were meant, not for creating pews, but for providing churches for the people. In the present state of the House, however, he should rest content with having brought the matter forward. The noble Earl had not said whether he was prepared to lay on the Table of the House the balance-sheet.

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER was understood to say that the noble Earl would find all the information he required already on the Table.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

QUESTIONS.

POST OFFICE—MAIL BAG—TIVERTON JUNCTION—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HEATHCOAT AMORY asked the Postmaster General, Whether his attention has been called to the defective state of the apparatus at Tiverton Junction for receiving letters from the mail train on the Great Western Railway, and the serious injury to letters consequent thereon—the mail bag having been damaged on the morning of the 5th of this month, and this being the third or fourth time a similar accident has occurred; and, whether any, and, if so, what remedy he proposes for the prevention of similar accidents for the future?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that in order to prevent the damage referred to in the Question, the speed of the train would in future be considerably slackened as it approached the station, and other precautions would be taken.

CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE—QUESTION.

LORD ERNEST BRUCE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether any site in the Metropolis has yet been selected for the erection of Cleopatra's Needle; and, whether there is not likely to be some difficulty, as to land carriage, in placing it at any great distance from the side of the river?

MR. GERARD NOEL, in reply, said, the obelisk referred to by the noble Lord was still at Alexandria. The vessel destined to carry it to England was in the harbour of that port, and he hoped that in a couple of months she would be on her voyage home. Four important sites had been suggested for the obelisk. One was on the Embankment, opposite the Northumberland Avenue. Another, also on the Embankment, by Whitehall Stairs, was near St. Stephen's Club. [Ironical cheers.] That, he might say, was not his suggestion. The third site was in the open space to the south of Westminster Palace, opposite Abingdon Street. The fourth was in the centre of Parliament Square, in the midst of those distinguished men who now adorned that place. Nothing, however, had yet been definitely settled with regard to the site. As to the second part of the Question, there would, he believed, be great difficulty and even risk in endeavouring to convey the obelisk, which was supposed to weigh between 200 and 250 tons, through the streets of London to a place distant from the river side.

THAMES FLOODS (METROPOLIS).

QUESTION.

MR. WATNEY asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether, as the Metropolitan Board of Works have determined to abandon their Bill for the Prevention of Floods, any, and if any, what steps will be taken by the Board to render London secure from floods during the ensuing winter?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: Sir, in answer to the Question of my hon. Friend, I beg to inform him that the Metropolitan Board of Works has no power to execute any works for rendering London secure from floods. It will rest with the local authorities to exercise the power which they possess under the Metropolis Local Management Acts and to give effect to the judgment of the High Court of Justice on the 12th inst., which has decided that the protection of the districts from the influence of the river is in the exclusive control of the Vestries and District Boards. I need hardly add that the Metropolitan Board will be always ready to assist with their advice any of the local authorities who may be desirous of availing themselves of the information collected by the Board in relation to this important subject.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT — DECK CARGOES—THE "BUSTONVALE." QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he is aware that the barque "Bustonvale" was, on the 7th instant (June), compulsorily measured at Greenock for extra Tonnage Duty in consequence of carrying two spare spars on deck, in order to make the ship seaworthy in accordance with Lloyds' rules, and for which the master had to pay ten shillings for a Customs certificate, which tax will have to be paid on each occasion that he pays off his crew in a British port; and, if he will consider what measures may be adopted for the purpose of preventing the practice complained of?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the case of the Bustonvale has been brought to my notice. The duty of measuring spaces on deck occupied by cargo has lately been transferred to the Customs officers. I have been in communication with the Board of Customs on the subject generally, and one result is that the space occupied by five spare spars will not be included in tonnage measurement, but be taken as part of equipment. Another result is, that the fee for measuring deck cargoes is abolished.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR—THE SUEZ CANAL—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If, seeing that the Russian Government has answered the intimation of Lord Derby relative to non-interference with the navigation of the Suez Canal in accordance with the wishes of Her Majesty's Government, he would be good enough to state if he can yet inform the House of the nature of the replies or communications received from the Porte and the Khedive of Egypt; and, if it be correct that the Government of the Porte objects to, and declines to entertain, the intimation of Her Majesty's Government forbidding the exercise of belligerent rights in the Canal, what measures he intends adopting for the proper protection of the Canal and its approaches?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the answer of the Porte to the communication of Her Majesty's Government respecting the Suez Canal was received by Mr. Layard on the 21st. Therefore, we have not yet received it in full. The substance of it, as reported by telegraph, is as follows:—

“The Porte assents to the view of Her Majesty’s Government relating to the free passage of the Canal for all neutral vessels. As regards hostilities in the Canal and its approaches, the Porte states that as the Canal is part of the Ottoman Empire, and has never been declared neutral, they cannot permit the access to it of enemies’ ships. They state that they have taken measures to protect the two entrances from the approach of enemies’ ships, but that they reserve the rights of Turkey and her prerogatives as the territorial Power.”

It will have been seen from the Papers laid before Parliament that the Russian Government have declared that they will not “bring Egypt within the radius of their military operations,” and that they will “neither blockade nor interrupt, nor in any way menace the navigation of the Suez Canal.” Under these circumstances Her Majesty’s Government do not feel it necessary to take any measures for the protection of the Canal, inasmuch as they rely upon the undertaking of the Russian Government that it will not be endangered.

THE NEW FOREST.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is true that the gates on the north side of Oakly Enclosure in the New Forest have been locked, so as to prevent access by a much used road to the beautiful old woods known as Oakly and Berry Woods; and, whether such locking of gates is not contrary to the assurances given by the late Secretary to the Treasury?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, he had ascertained that the gates had been locked as stated in the Question; but that he had communicated with the Commissioners of Woods, and had reason to believe that the roads would be opened in a day or two. He did not think that the assurances given by the late Secretary to the Treasury on the subject applied to the locking of the gates in question; but he was ready to admit that they might very fairly be taken to mean that the public should not be deprived of the convenience afforded by the ancient paths and roads through the Forest.

VACCINATION ACT PROSECUTIONS— CASE OF JOSEPH ABEL.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that another summons was, on the 19th instant, issued against Joseph Abel, of Faringdon, for the non-vaccination of his child Frederick Joseph Abel; whether it is not discretionary with the justices (under 30 and 31 Vic. c. 84, s. 31) to refuse to make the order; and, whether, under the circumstances of the numerous prosecutions and fines inflicted upon the defendant, and in deference to the opinion of the Local Government Board, he will advise the justices not to make the order?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it was true another summons had been issued against the person in question. He should not wish to give any legal opinion as to the discretionary power of magistrates to refuse to issue such an order against a person for the non-vaccination of his children. The question was one which would more appropriately be put to the Attorney General.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE ASSIZES.

QUESTIONS.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the fact that the Assizes throughout England have been fixed a fortnight earlier than usual; that this will have the effect of clashing with the Quarter Sessions which must be held on a certain week as fixed by Act of Parliament; that in several counties the Quarter Sessions will have to be adjourned, the courts being occupied by the Judges and the Bar, and that many officers of the county will necessarily be in attendance at the Assizes; and, whether he can give any hopes that this inconvenient state of things will be altered in the future, particularly as it is presumed a gaol delivery will be made at the Assizes whatever the nature of the offences may be?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had been in communication with the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice on the subject, and that he hoped an arrangement would be made by which the inconvenience referred to would be obviated in future. If legislation was found to be necessary, it would be attended to without delay.

MR. C. W. WYNN asked the right hon. Gentleman, Whether the Judges do not go circuit under a commission of general gaol delivery; and, whether he is aware in Montgomeryshire that the Lord Chief Baron has declined to try any prisoners committed at the Sessions?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he was not aware that the Lord Chief Baron had come to any such decision. He would, however, make inquiry into the matter, and give the hon. Member the result.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR—ASIA MINOR—SIR ARNOLD KEMBALL.

QUESTION.

MR. LAING asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give the House any information confirming or contradicting a statement of the correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph" at Erzeroum, to the effect that in the recent battle near Delibaba Sir Arnold Kemball was in such a prominent position with the Turkish army as to have been mistaken for a General acting with their forces, and to have only escaped the pursuit of the Cossacks by the fleetness of his horse; and, whether the instructions given to Sir Arnold Kemball and any other British officers accompanying the belligerent armies on either side, are such as to prevent them from doing anything inconsistent with a strict observance of the spirit and letter of Her Majesty's Proclamation of neutrality?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, no information has been received by Her Majesty's Government of the battle, the account of which is published in The Daily Telegraph, and which is reported to have taken place near Delibaba, and Her Majesty's Government, therefore, do not know what the position of Sir Arnold Kemball was on that occasion. With regard to the Instructions, about which the hon. Member asks me, given to Sir Arnold Kemball, I have to state that Instructions sent to Mr. Layard were to the effect that Sir Arnold Kemball was to follow the operations of the Turkish Forces, and that he was to report to Her Majesty's Government the result of those operations. With regard to the position he was to occupy, he was to follow his own discretion in any actions that might take place. With respect to the discharge of his duties generally, he was desired to discharge the duty of a delegate from a neutral Government to a belligerent army, and he was further desired, if he saw any excesses committed on the part of individual soldiers, to report those excesses to the Turkish Government immediately, and to do what he could to prevent them. I may also mention that similar Instructions have been given to the other officers that are following the Turkish Army.

HIGHWAYS—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the attention of the Government has been directed to the Report, in May last, of the Select Committee of this House on the Turnpike Acts Continuance, in which the following sentence occurs:—

"Your Committee must repeat their conviction that, unless some law is speedily enacted for the better management of highways, great injustice will be done to many parishes in consequence of the liability thrown on them of repairing roads which were constructed for the purpose of through traffic. Many roads will undoubtedly fall out of repair, and through want of timely legislation, much expense, which might have been avoided, will eventually be incurred in restoring the condition of these roads;"

this being a repetition of language equally strong in the previous Reports of May, 1875 and 1876; and, whether the Government intend to introduce, and to endeavour to pass during this Session, any measure to remedy the evils described in the Report referred to?

MR. SOLATER BOOTH, in reply, said, his attention had been directed to the recommendation referred to. He had brought the subject under the notice of the Government more than once, and they were anxious to legislate with respect to it, but they were not, as he had stated on a recent occasion, able to see their way to introduce a Bill dealing with it this Session.

DUBLIN METROPOLITAN POLICE—

CASE OF MR. J. A. BROWNE.

QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he can state the result of his inquiries into the case of Mr. J. A. Browne of Dublin?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, during the tenure of office of the late Government, the Carriage department of the Dublin Metropolitan Police was re-organized, and Mr. J. A. Browne's services were dispensed with, under circumstances which appeared at the time to preclude him from receiving the usual grant of a retiring pension. Mr. Browne subsequently memorialized the Government for a re-consideration of his case, and last summer I undertook that it should be carefully investigated. Having had the benefit of the advice of the Irish Law Officers on the subject, I arrived at the conclusion that though Mr. Browne was open to serious blame for mismanagement and negligence during the later months of a long period of service, nothing was proved against him of a graver nature, such as would be necessary to justify the extreme course of depriving him altogether of his ordinary right to pension on abolition of office. I have, therefore, recommended the case to the favourable consideration of the Treasury, and I believe that their Lordships are disposed to award a modified pension to Mr. Browne under the powers vested in them by Parliament.

NATIONAL BOARD OF EDUCATION
MODEL SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

MR. FAY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to act on the recommendation of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, by granting retiring pensions to the head teachers of Irish Model Schools?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: No, Sir, the Government have not felt themselves able to comply with the recommendation of the Commissioners in favour of this particular class of National School teachers. The whole question of pensions is now under the consideration of the Government, and in accordance with the promise given to the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon), the matter will receive our best consideration.

NAVY—H.M.S. "INFLEXIBLE."

QUESTIONS.

MR. ASHBURY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If Her Majesty's Government, will, at an early date, appoint a Select Committee to inquire into questions at issue relating to the doubtful stability of H.M.S. "Inflexible?"

MR. A. F. EGERTON: The Admiralty cannot consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the stability of the Inflexible. They consider there is no doubt of her stability, and are prepared to accept to the fullest extent their responsibility for the ship.

Subsequently—

MR. E. J. REED, in the absence of the First Lord, asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the official documents from which extracts were read in Committee of the Whole House by the late First Lord of the Admiralty on Monday evening, together with all other Reports which the Construction Department may have made to the Board upon the stability of the "Inflexible," and ships of her class?

MR. A. F. EGERTON, in reply, said, that he intended to lay on the Table the Report of the Director of Naval Construction, dated July 4, 1873, which was quoted by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen) in the recent debate on the Navy Estimates, together with other Correspondence and Reports bearing upon the question of the stability and efficiency of the Inflexible, and the Admiralty Minute stating the opinion of the Board thereon. He might take this opportunity of stating that there was at the Admiralty a floating model of this ship, and he had given instructions that if any hon. Member was desirous of seeing it, he should have every opportunity of inspecting it and of having such explanations given as he might think necessary, which bore upon the question of the stability of the ship.

MR. E. J. REED wished to state, for the information of the House, that the model referred to had been inspected by himself. [Cries of "Order!"] He had been invited to see the model, in consequence of the doubt raised as to the stability of the Inflexible. It was distinctly a model in which certain wooden material was placed that could not be removed; and it did not represent the dangerous condition of the ship. On the contrary, it represented a very different state of things.

ARMY—COURTS MARTIAL ON SERGEANT M'CARTHY AND OTHERS.
QUESTION.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Secretary of State for War, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House Copies of the Reports of the proceedings in the Courts Martial held in the cases of Sergeant M'Carthy, Corporal Thomas Chambers, and John O'Brien, convicted for breaches of the Articles of War?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that in accordance with the Articles of War, any person tried by court-martial, or anyone acting on his behalf, was entitled to have a copy of the proceedings, if applied for within three years. It was now, however, 10 years since the courts-martial in question were held, and he did not think it would be conducive to public policy that a Report of their proceedings should, after the lapse of so long a period, be laid on the Table of the House.

THE SLAVE TRADE—BRITISH MERCHANT SHIPS.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked Mr. Attorney General, With reference to the statement of the Secretary of the Admiralty, that H.M.S. "Rifleman" had seized twenty slaves on board two British ships in the Red Sea, the "Koina" and the "Rokeby," and that he referred to the Law Officers of the Crown, the question "whether any or what punishment can be awarded to captains or owners of ships so sullyng the British flag;" and, if he will inform the House whether British or International Law enables Government to punish officers or owners of British ships guilty of such offences in foreign waters, and if Government is prepared to put in force such powers as they have?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, in answer to the Question of the hon. Gentleman, I beg to state that the statute 5 Geo. IV., c. 113, entitled "An Act for the Abolition of the Slave Trade," provides ample means for preventing owners or masters of British ships aiding in any way the Slave Trade, and the provisions of that statute contain very severe penalties; for instance, persons offending are liable to penal servitude for life. I have not received full information of the circumstances connected with the receiving on board the two vessels mentioned; but, certainly, if it should be brought to my attention officially that the officers or owners of British ships were guilty of violating the provisions of the statute to which I have referred, I should recommend the Government to institute proceedings against them.

TIPPERARY.—QUESTION.

MR. A. MOORE asked the Postmaster General, Whether, considering the great distances between the presently existing telegraph stations in the county of Tipperary, he could open fresh postal telegraph stations at Cappawhite, and also at either Emly or Galbally?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that the cost was the difficulty in this matter of opening stations at Cappawhite and Emly. He was sorry to say he could not hold out any hope of being able to make the extension at the expense of the Department.

INDIA—THE FULLER AND LEEDS CASE.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, as there is a Motion on the Paper challenging the action of the Secretary of State for India in reference to the Fuller and Leeds Case, he will give the House an opportunity of expressing its opinion on that Motion; and, whether he can make any arrangement which will enable the Right honourable Gentleman the Member for the University of London, who has given Notice of that Motion, to bring it forward at such a time that a division upon it can be taken?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he should be glad if the opportunity in question could be found. He was unable, however, in the present state of Public Business, to promise to make an arrangement for bringing it forward.

ARMY—PROMOTION AND RETIREMENT
—THE WARRANT.—QUESTION.

MAJOR O'GORMAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any Military objection to the presentation to the House of Commons, by Military Officers, of Petitions in favour of the publication, prior to the expiration of the present Session, of the long-expected Warrant regarding promotion and retirement?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: In reply to the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford, I am sure with his experience of military discipline I need not point out that it would not be right for military officers to present Petitions to this House on the subject. If any officer wishes to make a complaint, and takes it to the Commander-in-Chief, it will receive every attention.

CRIMINAL LAW—MURDER OF SERGEANT BRETT.—QUESTION.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House Copies of the Reports of the trials held at Manchester in 1867 in connection with the shooting of Sergeant Brett?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: There are no official Reports connected with this matter that I am aware of. No doubt, there are the shorthand-writers' notes, and I believe the newspapers of the time gave very full reports of the trial; in fact, they contain all the information it is possible to get. I have nothing to add to what was published.

SUGAR CONVENTION.—QUESTION.

MR. THORNHILL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, having regard to the injury inflicted upon the sugar producing colonies of Great Britain by the system of granting bounties on the export of sugar, adopted by various Continental countries (which injury is complained of in a Petition which has been presented to Parliament by the inhabitants of Barbadoes), Her Majesty's Government can give any assurance to the House that the Convention recently concluded at Paris will be ratified by the contracting Powers at the time specified; and, if not, if he could state what is the reason of the delay, and what steps Her Majesty's Government propose to take to place the sugar trade of the four contracting countries upon that equal footing which it has been the object of negotiations for many years past to establish?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the draft of a Sugar Convention was signed at Paris on the 7th of March by the Delegates of Great Britain, Belgium, France, and Holland, subject to the approval of their respective Governments. In consequence of the modifications proposed by the Netherlands Government to be made in the Convention with the object of securing its acceptance by the States General, the Convention has not up to the present time been formally accepted by the Governments of the Powers interested. Her Majesty's Government have used and are using their best endeavours to bring the matter to a satisfactory issue; but it will be necessary that the Convention, when accepted by the Governments of the contracting countries, should be approved by the Legislative Assemblies of France, Belgium, and Holland before it can be ratified.

ARMY—RETIREMENT ON FULL PAY.
QUESTION.

COLONEL ALEXANDER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether permission to retire on full pay has been refused to several field officers who are entitled to it, on the grounds that no funds are available for this purpose; and, whether any of these officers have been pronounced medically unfit for further service?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, officers in the Army had no right to retire on full pay unless sufficient funds were available. A limited sum was granted for the purpose, and unless vacancies occurred it was impossible for officers to retire on full pay. Two Majors had been reported as medically unfit for further service. One of these officers had just received full pay from the fund in consequence of a vacancy, and the other would also receive it when a vacancy occurred.

THE NAVY—SHIPS OF WAR—A SELECT COMMITTEE—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If Her Majesty's Government will, without delay, appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the system now in practice for ascertaining, first, what are the various classes or types of vessels which best meet the requirements of Her Majesty's Naval Service; and, secondly, what is the system in practice for obtaining the most efficient designs for such classes?

MR. A. F. EGERTON, in reply, said, that the Admiralty could not consent to the appointment of the Select Committee referred to.

RESOLUTION.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved, in pursuance of Notice, "That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply."

MR. PARNELL wished to know, as a matter of Order, whether the Motion could be put from the Chair, except with the unanimous and universal consent of the House?

MR. SPEAKER: The House is aware that in consequence of the count-out, the Committee of Supply on Friday night last became a lapsed Order. Therefore, the House cannot go into Committee of Supply to-day unless the Order is again set up. The proceeding is usual and reasonable, and no other Notice besides that which appears on the Paper to-day is necessary, according to the practice of the House.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that it was a new practice, which was only introduced in 1861 by Lord Palmerston, the usual course previously to that, according to Sir Erskine May, having been when Supply became a dropped Order on Friday, to set it up again for the following Thursday. It had not been adopted more than three or four times of late years, and in his opinion the Motion under discussion ought not to be regarded by the House as an ordinary Motion. In the course of last year, on June 26, Mr. Disraeli had formally moved that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of Supply, because there had been a count-out. The House ought to be jealous of any interference with old-established forms. Besides, private Members had an interest in keeping Friday; but if when a count-out occurred on that day, the Government took Monday as a matter of course, it would have no object in keeping a House on Friday. For what reason, then, was the old rule departed from on the present occasion?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that the fact that the Secretary of State for War last week had put down the Army Estimates for that evening was a sufficient reason for the course the Government had taken. A pledge had therefore been given by the Government to that effect, and hon. Members had come down to the House expecting, of course, that the arrangement would be carried out. It would, therefore, cause great inconvenience as well as trouble if that understanding were now departed from, simply owing to the accident of a count-out. He did not know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) was in his place on Friday evening; but the Government made every effort to keep a House, and were present in considerable numbers; but it was impossible to keep a House, and, great as was the inconvenience on Friday night to several hon. Members, it would be still greater that night if the course of Business were disturbed and the Votes could not be taken. The practice of the House for the past 16 years in this respect had been one which had met with universal approval, and had arisen from the necessity of advancing Public Business.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that the custom was for dropped Orders to be put down at the bottom of the list of Orders for the Day ensuing, and the Motion for going into Committee of Supply ought to have been the last on the list. Sir Erskine May, however, had said that a Motion for Supply did not become a dropped Order—so that no question of the kind could occur. But in the year 1861 Lord Palmerston had connived at Supply being dropped by reason of a count-out, and had made a Motion like the one before the House, on the first day of the holidays. Of course, it would not be contended that all that Lord Palmerston had done was necessarily right. The Secretary of the Treasury had spoken of the uniform custom of the House for the last 16 years; but he himself had found no such uniformity. He had investigated the matter, and had found several instances of Supply and other Orders having been dropped by a count-out, and on those occasions the Government of the day had put them down again, not immediately, but after the lapse of a few days. He remembered, too, that Bills under the charge of the right hon. and learned Member for County Clare had been treated in that manner. It seemed, then, that with the exception of the one precedent created by Lord Palmerston—and that a precedent that ought not to be followed, inasmuch as it was a direct violation of the Rules of the House—the custom of the House was against the Government. Rules and precedents were made to restrict the action of the majority, and he did not desire to see any of them abandoned.

MR. PARNELL understood that the Notice of this Motion was not given in the usual way; but it was given after the Speaker left the Chair. He supposed that the Clerks at the Table knew the circumstances under which the Notice of the Motion was given; but he understood that the Speaker had left the Chair; and he wished to know under those circumstances whether, in the event of any objection being taken to the Motion, it would be proceeded with?

MR. SPEAKER: Before the House was counted out the Motion was perfectly in Order. If any objection is raised, I shall take the sense of the House in the usual way.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN hoped the sense of the House would not be taken on the subject, for this simple reason—that Her Majesty's Government had made arrangements to enable hon. Members to bring on questions in which they were interested, and if the Motion was not agreed to the rights of private Members would be extinguished. He had himself come a considerable distance with a view of supporting the Motion of an hon. Member.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he imagined if the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) were carried it would still be competent for hon. Members to proceed with their Notices on the Question that the Speaker do leave the Chair. But he hoped the House would not be put to the trouble of dividing. It was quite possible, as the right hon. and learned Member for Clare and the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath had remarked, that the proceedings in the matter were a little awkward and not altogether consistent. But the House ought to recollect how this difficulty arose. It arose from the application of two arrangements, both made by the consent and for the convenience of the House. The first arrangement was that Supply should be the First Order on Friday to enable hon. Members to raise discussion; and the other was, as the House had lately decided, that the Sitting should be specially adapted to the business of Supply. If the Government had followed any other course than that which they had adopted, the House would have had very just reason to complain. As had been stated by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, Notice was given last week that the Army Estimates should be proceeded with to-day; and if hon. Members found that in consequence of what had occurred on Friday night the Army Estimates would not be proceeded with, but that some Bill would be brought on which they had not expected, the House would have had much more reason to complain.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he had made no Motion on the subject; but had simply called attention to what had occurred. He hoped that the course which in this instance had been adopted by Her Majesty's Government would not become the ordinary practice.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, "That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply."

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ARMY—ROYAL ARTILLERY AND ENGINEERS—ARREARS OF INDIAN PAY.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

COLONEL JERVIS, in rising to call attention to the Papers respecting the arrears of pay due by the Government of India to Officers of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers; and to move that they be referred to a Select Committee, said, that the case concerned the Department of the Secretary of State for India, but it related to Her Majesty's British troops, and as they knew of no one to whom they were responsible but the Secretary of State for War, there was no other to whom they could look for redress of grievances. It was so laid down in the Articles of War. The matter, though relating to a small body of men, 250 in number, really involved a matter which could not any longer be overlooked—namely, the broad principle whether Her Majesty's troops when ordered to India were not entitled to all the rights and privileges conferred on them by the Crown and recognized by Parliament. He held that they had hitherto been deprived of those privileges, and his object was to press their case upon the Government. On the 22nd of February, 1872, Lord Cardwell, among other reforms, brought before the House the subject of the re-organization to a great extent of the Artillery and Engineers. That was no new subject. For many years the slow course of promotion had attracted attention, and in 1867 the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) moved for a Committee to inquire into the matter. On that Committee sat the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition. It was perfectly unanimous in its Report; but, on further consideration, there having been a change of Government, Lord Hampton considered the scheme recommended more expensive than he would like to present to the House, and he appointed a Committee at the War Office to consider the Report. Among the recommendations made by the Committee was that in future, on account of the changes which had occurred in the Artillery and Engineers, the first captains should be field officers. The thing was dropped, and in 1871 the question was brought before the House, and Lord Cardwell stated that a Commission had been ordered to go thoroughly into the whole question. In 1872 Lord Cardwell distinctly stated that the rank of field officers would be given to the first captains of the Artillery and Engineers. The question, however, was not then settled, and a considerable party was formed against the proposal, on the ground that it would interfere with the rights of officers of the Purchase Corps. On the 18th of June, 1872, an Address was moved and carried in the House of Lords, praying for a Commission to inquire into the alleged injustice to the Purchase Corps, and that the Royal Warrant should not be issued until the Commission had reported. In reply to that Address, Her Majesty stated that she was advised that the delay asked for in the issue of the Royal Warrant would be inexpedient. On the 28th the late General Sir Percy Herbert brought forward a Motion in the House of Commons to the effect that the matter should be re-considered. Lord Cardwell, in his reply, distinctly dwelt on the arrangement made with the India Office that field rank should be given to the first captains, and said that nothing should prevent him from carrying the scheme into effect. General Sir Percy Herbert did not get a Secunder. On the 5th of July, 1872, the Royal Warrant was issued granting the increase of pay and rank to these officers. On the 15th of August the Royal Warrant was published in India. Yet, after the decision of the House and after the publication of the Royal Warrant, it was not recognized in India, and the officers had received neither increase of pay nor rank. As soon as the Order was read in India the officers concerned had remonstrated by submitting their grievances through their commanding officers to the Commander-in-Chief, who considered they were justified in their application, and who forwarded the matter to the Government of India. The Government of India also thought these officers were entitled to have their grievances remedied, and it accordingly forwarded their application to the Secretary of State for India. The Secretary of State for India said, in his reply, that they were British officers; that the complaints should have gone through the Commander-in-Chief to the Secretary of State for War; and, in the meantime, he asked the Government of India to give him further information. According to this decision two officers made their complaint, and after four years of constant applications forwarded through the proper channel, the latest answer they had got from the War Office was in July, 1876, to the effect that the Petition of regimental officers for increased Indian pay and allowances would be submitted to Parliament in due course. But, in point of fact, the officers never petitioned; they merely asked for what was due to them. Up to the present time, no step whatever had been taken in India to carry out the Warrant. Letters had not been replied to, and the officers were wholly at a loss to know on what ground they had not received what they were entitled to under the Royal Warrant. But although no reply had been given, several excuses had been made, both in that House and out of it. It had, indeed, been said that Royal Warrants had no effect in India. He had, however, taken the trouble to peruse all the General Orders issued in the Bengal Province since the British troops formed part of the Forces in India, and he could find no instance on record of any Royal Warrant affecting promotion and pay which had not been recognized in India, and recognized from the date of the Warrant. If the Royal Warrant signed by the Secretary of State had no effect in India, why were these officers not told so before? From year to year these officers could get no answer, and the Commander-in-Chief in India could get no answer to their applications on the subject. It was also stated that the officers of the British Army were entitled to British pay. If so, why was it that they never got it? The officers complaining, though raised to the rank of major, never received the pay of majors, they only received the pay of captains. He was not sufficiently skilled in constitutional law as to say whether it was correct or incorrect; but looking at the question from a plain, common-sense point of view, he was of opinion that these Royal Warrants were not concocted by the Secretary of State, but were the result of the united deliberations of the Cabinet; and since India had been held by England, there was no precedent whatever by which any officer, if he obtained substantial rank, did not receive the allowances of that rank as well as the British pay of that rank. Another reason assigned for the non-recognition of those officers was that the India Office had not been consulted in the matter; but from the evidence given before the Committee on East India Finance it showed that in the opinion of the Secretary of the Military Department for the time, in the opinion of Lord Cardwell, and of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, the India Office had been duly communicated with in reference to the changes effected in the military organization. He came next to a rather peculiar point. As the House were well aware, the Government of India, following a system which had been more or less prevalent in Europe a century ago, made special allowances to officers for the equipment of their regiments. The last instance of this was the old regimental-clothing colonel, who received allowances for clothing his regiment. The system was objected to by His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, when the Royal Artillery was first sent out to India, and also on subsequent occasions, though it was approved of by Lord Panmure, Lord Ellenborough, and the Court of Directors. In 1859 and 1861 the Indian Government rather objected to it, on the ground that the stores sent to Bombay were said to be rotten. A Committee was then formed, of which Sir George Barker, who died early in India, was the Chairman, and that Committee reported against the system, but the Government of India considered it so essential on the ground of economy, that it was established throughout India. Lord Cardwell said that many officers made large sums of money out of these contracts and other matters; but the Duke of Argyll asked for further information with regard to them. An inquiry was instituted, and at the end of 18 months the result was that it appeared that, taking the whole of those contracts all round, able and experienced officers might make something like 25 per cent out of them, but that officers who were new to Indian Service, or who happened to have particularly long marches, were likely to be losers. The Government of India, finding that to be the case, and being desirous of extending the system, went further into the matter, and the result was that a confidential Circular was sent round to the officers commanding the Artillery in India, asking them to carry on these contracts at a higher rate than they were then receiving, but they declined to have anything further to do with them. The Government of India then took legal advice on the matter, which was to the effect that they could not force these officers to have to do with these contracts, and that they would have to take them over into their own hands. In a final Report, however, the Government of India said that whether the officers had made any money out of the contracts or not they had carried out their part of the bargain, and the matter had nothing to do with the question of their pay. They further said that if the officers had made money, it could be no excuse for withholding the pay from them. Lord Salisbury, in 1874, agreed in this view; and in July of that year he (Colonel Jervis) was informed that a Warrant would be sent out on the subject of the pay. The Warrant was not published in India till January following, and was not to take effect till April. Memorials and confidential communications on the subject were forwarded from India, but none of them, he believed, ever reached the War Office. It had been stated that when Lord Cardwell had promoted them it had been on the understanding that no increase was necessary to the pay and emoluments of commanding officers of batteries, and that any increase allowed should be charged on the Indian revenue. Lord Cardwell afterwards said—

“that financial considerations ought not to be overlooked; but he must consider what was just and expedient for the British Army; and that could not be set aside because the conditions in India were different from others.”

The Indian Government had admitted that the officers in India had to pay for fuel and travelling expenses, which in England were defrayed by the Government, and their pay was liable to income tax. His reason for bringing the subject forward was that British officers in India had no one to look to but the Secretary of State for War. These officers had been played with, the Secretary and Under Secretary of State being the battledores, and the officers the shuttlecocks, for the last five years; and sending them from the India Office to the War Office, and vice versa, was a system of dealing with the Indian Army that was utterly pernicious and destructible of discipline and good feeling. This same kind of conduct was pursued by the India Office towards non-commissioned officers. In June, 1875, a letter, however, was written by the Commander in Chief, bringing the subject under the notice of the War Office and requesting a settlement; but so far as he could make out no reply was sent to that letter. They were told that it was under consideration. A second letter was sent by the Commander in Chief to the India Office, but with no better result. He had heard, indeed, from Mrs. Grundy that the India Office could hold no communication with the Commander in Chief on the matter; and that it had taken three weeks to find out what portion of the Secretary of State's Department had to communicate with the India Office. In the meantime, the Commander in Chief in India had declared that that the matter would be brought before Parliament. It never had been; and as the subject could no longer be allowed to remain in abeyance, he had no alternative but to take the duty on himself. If these men were wrong and were not entitled to anything, why not tell them so in the first instance, and not go on in suspense for five years and then leave them where they were? The course that had been pursued had had the effect of making the Commander in Chief look absurd in India, and discipline was interfered with in consequence. His Royal Highness was colonel of the Royal Artillery and of the Royal Engineers, and how could he meet the officers? He believed that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War would admit that these gentlemen were entitled to the money. As to Lord Salisbury, who had done so much to put an end to ill-feeling in other branches of our Indian Service, he believed he was utterly unacquainted with the real state of affairs, for he was not the man to take refuge behind the Council of India. And what, he would ask, would be the feelings of those officers if, after they had been officially informed that the question of their grievances would be brought before the House of Commons, the House were that evening to say they would not entertain it? Such a course could only serve to impress the whole Army in India with the idea that a man the moment he left this country was at the mercy of the India Office, and if such a case as the present were slurred over we might not find it so easy to find men again when we required their services. The hon. and gallant Gentleman concluded by moving for a Select Committee to inquire into the subject.

COLONEL NORTH, on rising to second the Motion, said, that his hon. and gallant Friend had left very little for anybody to say on the subject; but he must express his astonishment at the manner in which these gallant officers had been treated, not the slightest attention having been paid to their remonstrances. An answer had not been received until 18 months after a letter had been written. These officers appeared to have done everything that officers were bound to do; their remonstrances had been couched in the most respectful terms, and he contended that they had not been well treated. A Committee ought to be appointed to inquire into the grievances, and if his hon. and gallant Friend pressed his Motion to a division he should certainly vote for it.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Papers respecting the arrears of pay due by the Government of India to Officers of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers be referred to a Select Committee,"—(Colonel Jervis),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he would briefly state the reasons why the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India had, with the unanimous approval of his Council, declined to admit the validity of the claims now made. Lord Salisbury, as his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Jervis) truly remarked, had given considerable attention to the grievances of Indian officers, and had dealt with them fairly and liberally. Therefore the House might be assured it was not without strong grounds that his Lordship took the course he had taken in the matter. A great deal had been said about the pay of British officers. Now, British officers were liable to serve in any part of Her Majesty's dominions. Whatever part of those dominions they might be in, they were legally entitled to the British pay of their rank. It was not alleged that the officers referred to in the Motion had not received that pay. On the contrary, he would show that they had received a great deal more. As long as British officers were paid by the English Treasury they scarcely ever received anything more than the British pay of their rank. In Ceylon, in Hong Kong, and some places elsewhere they received small Colonial allowances; but in India, and in India alone, allowances were given which were in many cases three times, and in all cases twice as much as officers received in any other part of Her Majesty's dominions. The Indian Government had never hesitated to treat the officers thus liberally, on the understanding that they alone should have the control over the extra pay and extra allowances. The difference between England and India was as follows, taking the rupee at 1s. 9½d.:—A lieutenant-colonel of Cavalry received £474 in England, and £1,673 in India; a lieutenant-colonel of Infantry, £365 in England, and £1,539 in India; a lieutenant-colonel of Artillery, £328 in England, and £1,109 in India; a captain of Artillery, £200 in England, and £466 in India; and so on. When the India Office gave their assent to a Royal Warrant, they were always very careful first to ascertain what additional charge should be imposed upon their military expenditure. In 1872 the India Office heard indirectly that there was an intention on the part of the War Office to make the promotions in rank which had been referred to; and in February, 1872, a letter was written by the Duke of Argyll to the War Office, pointing out that the effect of the proposed promotion would be to increase the military expenditure of India if they carried Indian allowances. Lord Cardwell, in reply, said that the financial arrangements of India and the military allowances were controlled by the Secretary of State for India, and if he thought them too large he could reduce them. That circumstance alone showed that there was a perfect understanding between the two Secretaries of State upon the subject. If the claim now brought forward were forced on the Indian Government it would involve an increased charge of about £50,000 a-year on the revenues of India. The objection of the India Office to the proposal was two-fold. They thought the promotion was unnecessary; but as the question was a military one, they waived that objection. But they also had a financial objection, for the Royal Warrant, as originally proposed, was drawn in such a manner that it put the officers promoted in the same position as other majors of the Army. They feared that claims such as the present might be preferred, and accordingly the Royal Warrant was purposely altered to prevent them being made. The Indian Government having received a number of Petitions from these officers, who thought they were entitled to get the same pay as other majors, wrote to the Duke of Argyll suggesting the abolition of what was called the contract system, and an increase of the rate of pay of all the officers who had been recently promoted. The contract system, by which all captains of batteries were enabled to make considerable profits, was a bad system, and the Royal Artillery had always objected to it. The great majority of the first captains of Artillery in India were in receipt of these contract allowances, and Sir George Barker in 1860 had advised an equivalent in the shape of long pay. He put it at 300 rupees per month, but the Indian Government now estimated it at between 150 and 200. The Duke of Argyll, however, required accurate information before he decided on the amount to be given. This information arrived from India after the noble Duke had left office; and Lord Salisbury, who succeeded him, gave his assent to the increased expenditure as soon as the contract system was abolished, which took place on the 1st of April, 1875. This was done to remove a grievance and to get rid of an objectionable system; but now, after making this concession to the officers, and giving them increased pay, the Indian Government were asked to give this increased pay in addition to the contract allowances from the date of the Royal Warrant—in other words, the Royal Warrant issued in England must ipso facto carry with it Indian allowances and Indian pay. If that were once admitted, it would destroy the fundamental principle of Indian finance; and he was sure the Secretary for War would not desire such an alteration, which would also involve the English military authorities in great difficulties. His hon. and gallant Friend had wished the case to be referred to a Select Committee; but in doing so they would only follow up a foregone conclusion. The whole question, in fact, was whether they were dealing with arrears of pay, or with a demand for increased pay. Lord Salisbury having looked carefully into the facts, had come to the conclusion that this was a claim which could not be admitted. His Council, which included several military men, who were usually tender towards grievances, were unanimous in their opinion of it. The Indian Council, it should be remembered, had by Act of Parliament an absolute veto upon all expenditure, and he could not imagine that Parliament would take away from it that control and transfer it to the War Office. Certainly it was to be regretted that any of the officers should have made complaints for some time without being answered; but the Secretary of State was giving the matter his attention, and Papers would soon be on the Table of the House. The transaction had occurred before the present Government entered office, and their claims were a legacy which, however unpleasant it might be, would have to be settled. It was plain, nevertheless, that the charge ought not to be on the revenues of India, and the Duke of Argyll, had he anticipated them, would never have agreed to the Warrant. His hon. and gallant Friend had stated that the case was before Parliament; for his own part, he did not think so, though, no doubt, Parliament was the ultimate appeal. He was not sorry that appeal had been made, for it had given him an opportunity of mentioning the circumstances under which the Warrant had been issued; the conditions imposed by the Duke of Argyll, and the care he had taken to state distinctly that he did not intend to allow the charge to be placed on the Indian revenues. Under these circumstances, he must ask the House to negative the Motion; for if the question had concerned the finances of England, there would have been but one answer—namely, that of the English taxpayer: he believed, however, that the House would in like manner protect the taxpayers of India.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that according to Lord Cardwell, it was intended that the rank of major in the Artillery should carry the pay of major of the Line. Nothing could be clearer than that; but the fact was that there was a want of correspondence between the two offices, and the India Office had repudiated the increased pay. The noble Lord had referred to a letter in which the India Office had refused to sanction the increased pay; but these words occurring in another part of the same letter—

“It must, at the same time, be considered that what is just to the British Army cannot be set aside, because the peculiar arrangements of India render the change more expensive.”

The noble Lord had endeavoured to prove that the two Offices had acted in concert to oppose the pay from the year 1872 to 1874; and he could demonstrate that the War Office could not possibly interfere. The fact was that up to 1875 there was no possibility of the War Office objecting. He believed that the War Office and the India Office were acting together now; but were they to take the answer of the noble Lord as final, or were they to expect to hear something from the Secretary of State for War; because, if the noble Lord spoke not only for the India Office, but also for the War Office, why did not Lord Cardwell speak not only for the War Office, but for the India Office, in 1872? The fact was that for two years they had been giving these officers a superior rank without any increase of pay, and the consequence was, that they had to maintain a superior position and to meet heavier expenses without a similar increase of income.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR supported the Motion. He was in favour of the utmost economy being at all times exercised with regard to the finances of India; and at no previous period, not even when the finances of India were in great disorder after the Mutiny, was real economizing in the management of Indian expenditure more needed than at the present time, when new or additional taxes were about to be laid on the people of India in order to meet imprudent and unwise outlays; but, at the same time, he thought justice ought to be done, and that there were many openings both in the civil and military services for effecting these economies without resorting to the objectionable practice of withholding from individuals their fair and reasonable claims, and on this broad ground he considered every officer entitled to the remuneration which the custom of the service had entitled him. At all events, it was right that the interests of these officers should be protected at any cost. Injustice had already been done to the Artillery officers in that case—he cared not by what means or in what way—and a remedy ought to be found. When the Government saw fit, whether rightly or wrongly, to raise first captains to field rank they were bound to give them the pay of that rank. It had been stated by the noble Lord that Artillery officers had been already sufficiently remunerated in India by contract allowances. Well, he admitted that some Artillery officers had made money by contract allowances; but many who were careless did not cover the expenses they had incurred. But it was wrong to say that the officers alone benefited by these contracts, for the Government of India was far more benefited; the work done for the money paid under these contracts between the commanders of batteries and the State was far more cheaply, and, on the whole, as efficiently done than if the Government had retained the duty. Besides, the abolition of the contracts could have easily been ordered in 1872 as they had been since; it was, therefore, in the interests of the State that these contracts were kept up until 1875, and, being so kept up for the benefit of one party, there was no reason for keeping back the pay of majors until the Government found it convenient to undertake the work. Then, another reason might be urged, that though 58 battery officers were in receipt of profits from contracts with the Government to maintain batteries and houses in an efficient state out of the allowances, yet there were 28 battery commanders who had no such contract allowances, but who, holding the rank of major, were only paid as captains, being a course entirely at variance with all the precedents in India. On this ground he supported the Motion.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, that this was a question which had been going on for several years, and, as had been admitted by his noble Friend, no answer had been given either by the Office of the Secretary of State for War, to which the officers looked, or by the India Office, who were to give the extra pay. That no answer should have been given was a great grievance in itself, and ought not to be tolerated by the House. It was a plain, straightforward question, and it was a mischievous and a miserable thing that a question of pay and allowances should be bandied about between two great Offices of State, the War Office and the India Office, and that neither of those two great Departments should have taken it up and settled the question. He had himself formed part of a deputation to his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War in relation to this subject; and, judging from his words, as well from the expression of his countenance, he certainly understood that he thought the officers had a very good case, and that he would be prepared fully to endorse what Lord Cardwell had stated in that House, when without any reservation he declared that it was necessary in the interests of the service that first captains of Artillery and Engineers should have the substantive rank of majors in the Army with the pay and emoluments of that rank. He therefore hoped the House would pause before they gave a vote adverse to the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Jervis). A compromise had been arrived at in 1875 which now satisfied the officers, and it was only right that the claims of those who served as majors from 1872 to 1875 should be allowed. He looked to his right hon. Friend, in conjunction with the India Office, to do justice to these men.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that during the discussion he had been so frequently appealed to, that he thought it his duty to say something with reference to the question. It was quite true that when he first heard of this case, and especially when he received the deputation which had been alluded to by his hon. and gallant Friend, he thought a great deal of it—that it required further investigation, and so far as the War Office was concerned there had been no lack of energy in calling upon the India Office to say whether they would do what was required or not. The Secretary of State for India in Council had the power conferred upon him to say what they would pay out of the India finances in respect of the Army; and it was to them he had had to appeal, and to them they must look for a decision. At the same time, he ought to say that when he read the answer of Lord Salisbury, which he was sorry, through some misapprehension, was not on the Table of the House, he had come to the conclusion that, though there had been some confusion in the beginning of the case, there was an explicit understanding that if these majors were made, their promotion was not to entitle them to these additional allowances in India, entailing such a large expense. One fact which showed that that must have been the case was this—There was the arrangement of contract allowances to captains in India, on which it had been said some of them made a profit of 25 per cent. Captains of Horse Artillery in India received £605 independent of contract allowances, whereas majors at home had only £356 5s. 6d. Captains in India had nearly double what majors had at home, so that being made a major probably brought a man up to what he had as a captain in India. But there were others who had not these contract allowances; and the Duke of Argyll showed how entirely he considered the matter was in his own hands; as, in order to equalize the receipts of these two classes, he raised those who had not these beneficiary contracts from 30 rupees to 100 rupees per month. And these officers, who thus had their pay increased, were amongst the majors who were now asking for arrears. They were not, in fact, arrears of pay at all—they were allowances given in India at the discretion of the Indian Government. They were under the control of the Secretary of State for India in Council. After a full consideration of all the circumstances of the case, Lord Salisbury had, he believed, judiciously come to the conclusion that they were not bound to give these arrears. No doubt the intention of Lord Cardwell had been to put the majors in India on the same footing as majors of the Line; but when he consulted with the Secretary of State for India a difficulty arose which he did not foresee with reference to the charge on India, and an alteration was made in the Warrant accordingly, making it imperative on the Government of India not to pay those claims. The Duke of Argyll, in order to compensate those who had not contract allowances, added to their income 70 rupees per month; but though the majors were content to receive an increase of income of 70 rupees per month from the Secretary of State for India, they refused to accept any decrease of pay from the same authority, although that discretion was clearly given to him by the Act. Sir John Adye had gone fully into this matter, and was clearly of opinion that these majors were not entitled to have the full pay and allowances of majors in India; and that was acted upon from the beginning. It was a great pity there had not been more negotiation at first, and that everything had not been put in writing on a clear and accurate footing; but the Indian Government had acted throughout in good faith and honour in the matter with the War Office, and he could not but support his noble Friend the Under Secretary in the conclusion he had come to.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, it was immaterial whether the late or the present Government were to be blamed for the lapse that had occurred with reference to this subject. This was a question of justice and truth, and it ought not to be decided on narrow technicalities. He would ask whether, when these officers were promoted to the rank of major, they were informed that they would not receive additional pay in the usual manner—namely, by a General Order of the Governor General in Council? [MR. GATHORNE HARDY: There was a General Order issued in August.] It was not issued in the usual terms; and as there had been a misunderstanding on the subject, he thought as a point of honour they ought to do what these officers asked, and not, at any rate, allow their case to be bandied about between the two Offices without any notice being taken of the grievance under which they undoubtedly suffered. The refusal to pay what the officers believed they were entitled to, had created a great deal of dissatisfaction, and if the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Jervis) insisted on a division he should feel bound to vote with him.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the following were the words used by Lord Cardwell in introducing the Army Estimates in 1872:—

“We now propose to establish the rank of major in the Artillery with a pay and position similar to that of major in the Line.”—[3 Hansard, ccix. 892.]

But no one in the House at the time, and no officer interested in the matter, could suppose for a moment that Lord Cardwell had control over the revenues of India. The pay and allowances of the Army in India rested absolutely with the Indian Government, and when Lord Cardwell made the statement, he was perfectly acquainted with the fact. When the time came for the Warrant to be issued, Sir Thomas Pears pointed out the existence of the contract allowances, and showed that to give the Artillery majors the full pay of Line majors, in addition to those lucrative allowances, was to impose too great a burden upon the Indian taxpayers. It was to avoid this that a break was made in the rate of pay, and it was fixed at 14*s.* 6*d.* and 18*s.* 6*d.*, with a command allowance of 1*s.* 6*d.* That allowed the Indian Government to make such an arrangement as they chose, and prevented them from being saddled with an expense altogether out of proportion to that which they were entitled to bear. As to those arrangements anyone who knew Lord Cardwell knew him to be a man who would not make any statement unless he was able to carry it out, and yet such a statement he would have made had he promised these officers additional pay in India. Sir Thomas Pears, whom the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Jervis) had attacked, was a man of the highest honour and integrity, and there was nothing contradictory between his statement and that which his noble Friend had made in this House.

The House divided:—Ayes 93; Noes 145: Majority 52.—(Div. List, No. 190.)

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, proposed.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, in opposing the Motion, said, he had often heard that no interest was taken in Indian affairs, unless personal matters were involved. He confessed that when he compared the attendance that evening, when a question had been before the House affecting certain persons outside the House, who, however, had strong influence inside the House, with the attendance the other night when the Indian Budget was under discussion, and when the whole question of Indian finance was being debated, he was obliged to come to the conclusion that those who made this statement were right. The vote just given, if effect were given to it, would reverse the whole policy on which was founded the financial Government of India. He would yet trust that, in the end, the official statements would prevail over the impassioned appeal which had been made that evening. He should, therefore, again divide the House against the Motion.

Resolved, That the Papers respecting the arrears of pay due by the Government of India to Officers of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers be referred to a Select Committee.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ARMY—FIRST CLASS RESERVES.

RESOLUTION.

MR. J. HOLMS, in rising to move the following Resolution:—

"That, having regard to the fact that men of the First Class Army Reserve, when called out last autumn, appeared in a larger proportion than any other branch of Her Majesty's Forces, this House is of opinion that it would be expedient to allow at least five thousand men now in barracks, who are over thirty years of age and have had ten years service, to retire into that reserve," said, he was sorry that so long a period as three and a-half months had elapsed before an opportunity was afforded to the House of discussing the Army Estimates. He regretted this the more, because, in the first place, the matter could be discussed without anything of Party feeling; and in the second, because he thought the House was bound to inquire now how far the plan of Lord Cardwell had answered, and more especially, seeing the state of affairs in the East, and the existence of a war which might extend over Europe and even to our own shores, to consider what was the state of our military Forces. He gave the Secretary of State for War every credit for the loyalty with which he had endeavoured to carry out the plans of Lord Cardwell in re-organizing the Army; but, as the years of transition from the old to the new system had passed by, it was now both wise and expedient that the public should have a full and frank diagnosis of the condition of the Army. His object was to state certain facts in order to show that the existing condition of things was unsound, and then to ask some questions of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War as to the means to be taken in order to provide a remedy, and to which he hoped the Committee would get satisfactory answers, before any more money was voted. Rumour said that the Government contemplated asking for a vote of £5,000,000, and in about six weeks Parliament would have ceased to be sitting. Under these circumstances the interests of the nation demanded a full and careful investigation of, and an intelligent criticism upon, the condition of our military Forces. At the time of the reforms introduced by Lord Cardwell it was generally agreed that the condition of our military Forces was such that it was essential to the safety of the country that they should be put upon a sound footing; and that the cost of our Army was out of all proportion to the number of men that we could bring together in case of emergency. The remedy that was proposed was that in future, in time of peace, the Army should create and maintain a Reserve of young men who, in time of war, should rejoin the Army, and it was predicted that the country would receive its reward in having a thoroughly efficient Army and a diminishing military expenditure. So far, however, from the expenditure having decreased, it had increased, and was still increasing. Comparing the year 1874 with 1877, he said the Estimates in the former year were £14,485,700, while the Estimates for the present year amounted to £15,443,700; but there were Supplementary Estimates, which had been already voted, amounting to £140,000, making altogether £15,583,700, or an increase upon the year 1874 of £1,098,400. Last year the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War proposed to give an increase of pay to the extent of 2*d.* per day to a certain class of men in the Army, and he did so with a view, as he stated, to reduce the enormous amount of desertion which then prevailed. As a matter of fact, this had just worked the other way, and he (Mr. Holms) ventured at the time to express a different view as to the result of the proposal from that taken by the right hon. Gentleman; for he held that the effect of giving an increase of pay to one class of the men would be to increase desertion among those who would not come within the scope of the proposal. Its financial result was this—that in five years the additional charge would add £200,000 to the Estimates; in 10 years it would add £300,000; in 15 years, £400,000; while in 20 years and every year afterwards it would add £500,000 to the Estimates. Then, again, India this year was called upon to pay £260,000 more for her recruits than she paid last year, not because she was getting more, or a better article for the money; on the contrary, she was getting less, and a worse article. She was, under the existing system, always called upon to pay for our experiments and our failures. Well, he thought he had shown clearly, as he had said, that our military expenditure, both at home and in India, had greatly increased since 1874, and that it was still increasing. And now he would consider how was 1877 as compared with 1871 as regarded actual numbers. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War stated, in introducing the Army Estimates, that our Establishments were full, and he was perfectly right in saying so. But while that was so, the actual number they had now was 4,048 men fewer than they had throughout the year 1871. It was stated in the annual abstract that the average Force throughout that year of non-commissioned officers and men was 183,471, which, with 3,448 of the First Class Army Reserve brought the total up to 186,919. In the beginning of the present year, there were 181,875 non-commissioned officers and men and 6,062 of the First Class Army Reserve, making a total of 187,837. That would at first sight appear to be an increase; but a close examination of the Estimates for each year would show that this year 5,066 men were transferred from the permanent Staff of the Militia to the Regular Army. Thus in comparing the numbers they ought either to add these to 1874, or to subtract them from this year. If this was done, the result would be, as he had stated, to show that we had, at the present time, 4,048 fewer men than in 1871. Again, in 1870 and 1871 we had the enormous force of 64,000 men rated as old pensioners. This year they were asked to vote 68,234 of the same class, at an expense of £153,000 for them more than they had voted under that head in 1871. The right hon. Gentleman, in introducing the Army Enlistment Bill in 1876, said that his object in doing so was to induce a better class of men to enter the Army—a class which would greatly reduce desertion. Well, it had not had that effect; and, in fact, the condition of our soldiers at that moment was not creditable to the nation. He would compare the amount of military crime with that of civil crime, as between the years 1873 and 1875. They had recently had before them a measure of considerable interest—namely, the Prisons Bill; and in the course of the discussion to which it gave rise facts were stated which showed a satisfactory condition on the part of the people of this country—a moral advancement among its industrial population which was highly satisfactory. They were told, on the authority of the Government, that our prisons were far too numerous, and that it was possible to close at least 50 of them in England and Wales; and that this was due not so much to higher wages or the spread of education, but in no small degree to the prevalence of a kindlier system—a stretching out of the hand towards men to give them self-control and that self-respect, which, as his hon. Friend the Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) had well said, was the foundation of all respect. They had, however, on the other hand, a system of treatment in the Army which they had a right to expect would have prevailed in the 16th or 17th centuries rather than at the present day. What were the facts? The proportion of crime, or what was included under that head, in the Army was infinitely greater than that of the civil community. The number of criminal convictions in the United Kingdom in the year 1870 was 18,400; while in 1875, with a great increase of population, the number had fallen to 15,580. The number of sentences by court-martial in 1870 was 6,900, or, as the Army was small then, the corrected number would be 7,600, while in 1875 the number had increased to 9,000, and that among 93,000 men. If they only had the same proportion as between the numbers of the Army and that of the civil population, they would have only 93 soldiers in prison instead of 2,060.

He visited Millbank the other day, and there, within three-quarters of a mile of that House, he found 550 military prisoners, about 500 of whom, under a more common-sense system, would not be there at all. If there were 62 Bulgarian prisoners confined in a prison, questions would be asked in that House, and there would be a full attendance of hon. Members; but the existence of things at Millbank was regarded as a matter for no comment. The punishments in the Army had by no means decreased. In 1870 there were 1,616, in 1871 there were 1,032, and in 1876 there were 1,682 punishments inflicted. No fewer than 164,000 minor punishments were inflicted upon soldiers in 1875. Those were the years when they were told that the condition of the soldier was improving; but, in his opinion, it was getting steadily worse. The truth was that the condition of the Army was such that no respectable young man would enter it, even if the pay were raised to 10s. a-day, and the conditions of the Service must be altered before they would be able to attract them to join. At the beginning of the Session the hon. and gallant Member for Winchester (Colonel Naghten) asked the Home Secretary, whether he was aware of the great number of criminal offences committed wherever large bodies of troops were stationed, and whether, if those offences were not diminished, it was the intention of the Home Office to send down an increased force of police at the cost of the Government? It used to be said by Sir Robert Peel and Lord Palmerston, when the number of military Forces was objected to, that they acted as police to preserve peace and order; but, in this case, the Government had been invited to send down police to keep the troops in order. They had received Returns as to the state of the Army in 1874 and 1875, and he thought that, as a Member of the House, he ought to be furnished with the fullest information as to its state in 1876. The all-important question connected with the Army, as showing what the hold was they had on the men, was the crime of desertion, and the test of desertion was the number of men branded as deserters by being advertized for by the War Office. In 1871 the number thus advertized for was 6,971, and in 1876, 7,610, as belonging to the Regular Army. The number in the Militia was, in 1871, 6,641, and in 1876, 11,469. Last year was the crowning year of desertion; for, while in 1871, 13,600 were regarded—and justly—as an enormous number of deserters, the aggregate number who deserted from the Army and the Militia was about 19,000. In a single month of last year—namely, October—the desertions were from the Army, 854, and from the Militia, 1,600, making a total of 2,454. The War Office was in despair, and these desertions were causing such deficiencies in the ranks that something desperate had to be done; the physical standard had to be lowered, and they were taking young men or old, long men or short. He warned the House not to be carried away with any idea whatever that the Army was improving—it was doing nothing of the kind; it was steadily sinking and subsiding from every point of view. During the quarter ending in March the deserters advertised for were—last year, 1,750, and this year, 2,020. As to crime in the Army, if it were regarded as a blot in 1871, it was greater and darker in 1877. The expense of dealing with these criminal offences was not inconsiderable. The sickness and mortality which were also regarded as too great in 1870 or 1871 had increased, but the increase was so small that he would say it was infinitesimal. He would next ask the House to look at a more serious question. The cardinal principle which was laid down in 1871 of having an annual Reserve of trained men had not been at all successful. All the discussions of that time centred upon the Reserve, and the Preamble of the Army Enlistment Bill recognized the same principle, while all the speakers in the debate insisted upon it, that it was essential to have sufficient time in order to create a Reserve. Captain Vivian, on the faith of actuarial calculations, was glad to be able to tell the British taxpayer what he might expect, and he told us, to a man and to a day, how we were to get these Reserve Forces. In seven years ending on the 12th of August this year we were to have 61,266 men; next year, 81,811; and in 1883, the 13th and final year of the scheme, 178,964, who were to be under the age of 31. These were actuarial calculations of what was necessary for the safety of the country; and our position was worse now than when they were made. The House would observe the exactness of these numbers and would remember that those men were to be under the age of 31 years. He would like to know how many of those 61,000 men would turn out on the 12th of August of this year? He had endeavoured every year to show that these anticipations could not be realized at the rate at which we were obtaining recruits; and he was told—"Only wait until 1877, when our plans will be matured, and then we will discuss it." Well, then, let them discuss the question that evening. Last year, the Secretary of State for War said the Reserve was not large, but he expected that this year it would be numbered by as many thousands as there were hundreds last year; and on that account he said last year it would be contrary to common sense to adopt the revolutionary system advocated by the hon. Member for Hackney, as it would throw everything into confusion just at the moment the new system was coming into operation. Was the right hon. Gentleman satisfied with the new system now that it was in operation? He might have had the wrong figures handed to him at the War Office; but it was astonishing he should have adhered to them.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I never said anything of the kind; if the hon. Member will look to what I have said, he will find I never anticipated more than about 7,000 or 8,000 men this year.

MR. J. HOLMS said, he would not attribute to the right hon. Gentleman anything he could not find in Hansard. On the 1st of January this year, there were 6,062 men in the First Class Reserve, and in 1871, there were 7,022, so that in six years, in place of an increase in the Reserve for which we had paid millions, there was a decrease of 960 men. The right hon. Gentleman said he could not depend upon more than 3,000 men being added this year, and His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, in his evidence before the Militia Committee (Question 7,843), said it was not probable the Reserve Force would reach 21,000 in the course of the next four years. Would the House be justified, if it recognized this condition of things without a protest? If a Birmingham manufacturer had undertaken to deliver 61,266 rifles by the 12th of August, 1877, and when the time came he had only 9,000 ready, but pointed to the capacity of his establishment and his stock of raw material, he would not be trusted in future; and the complaint against the War Office was, that it pointed to the raw material, instead of producing the manufactured article which had been promised and paid for. If the promise had been kept and we had 60,000 men living at their homes, the result might have been fewer men living in barracks by 30,000 or 40,000, and a reduction of the Estimates by £1,000,000 or £2,000,000. This was the central question, to which we were bound to look. Of the 3,889 men called out last year, only 1½ per cent failed to appear, and high eulogiums were passed upon their appearance by the Secretary for War, while none of them got into difficulties. That showed they were the sort of men they wanted, that they constituted the best and cheapest Force, and that the safety of the nation did not depend upon the number of men in barracks, but upon the number of trained men in the country. This was the direction in which we must look if we were to get rid of crime and desertion. If the safety of the nation was dependent upon the prospective Reserve in 1871, it was still more dependent upon it in 1877. The Secretary for War had made no sign for three years, and he could scarcely expect the House now to refrain from expressing an opinion. The result of all the endeavours to form a Reserve was, that it did not exist. He must now come to the quantity and quality of the raw material. And with regard to that, our condition was worse than it was in 1871; it was worse also in comparison with the other Armies of Europe, which had been improving, while ours had been retrograding. If the Government could not get recruits, they ought to take the House into their counsel. Superficial observers went to Aldershot and saw a handful of battalions, containing, as they were told, a number of recruits, and they were satisfied with the condition of the British Army; but they overlooked the fact that what they saw was but a handful, and forgot that the difficulty was what they did not see—those who were discharged as incorrigible, those who were playing hide and seek, and the raw recruits who were being manufactured into soldiers. In dealing with the quantity and the quality of the raw material from which our soldiers were manufactured, he would refer to the statement made on the part of the Government on the 9th of March, 1871, that the number of recruits which would be necessary annually to enable us to maintain our Army and the Reserve upon a proper footing was 32,449. But, looking at the number of recruits enlisted during the five years commencing in 1871, he found that instead of our having obtained 163,400 recruits in that period, as we ought to have done had the Government programme been carried out, we had only enlisted 97,600, being 65,800 short of the proper number Parliament and the nation had been led to expect. Yet, in view of these facts, we were told year after year that recruiting was in an excellent state, and that we were getting all the men we wanted. He denied the accuracy of that statement altogether. Instead of obtaining 32,500 recruits in 1876, we only enlisted 29,370, leaving us, in round numbers, 3,000 short. In our modern system, with respect to quality, it was absolutely necessary that a certain age in regard to recruits should be closely observed. The recruit was the raw material out of which the soldier was made; and all Europe was agreed that the life of a soldier—the fighting period of his career—only lasted 12 years—namely, from 20 to 32 years of age. The limit of age for enlistment had been fixed by the War Office Memorandum of 1873, at from 18 to 25, that for passing into the Reserve being fixed at 31. For two years that limit had been strictly adhered to, and no recruits were enlisted in the Infantry regiments above the age of 21, the average age of recruits up to April, 1875, being from 19 to 20. He would now proceed to lay before the House figures which would show them to what a pass recruiting had come. The War Office were now taking men as recruits who were 30 years of age—that was to say, within one year of the age which was the limit for their being passed into the Reserve. During the first five months of 1876 we obtained only 8,754 recruits; and in the five months following, when the limit of age was set aside, we obtained 10,000. Then the War Office lowered the standard from 5ft. 5in., at which it had remained since 1871, to 5ft. 4½in., and the result of both changes was to give us 29,370 recruits for the year. The consequence was, that recruits were taken at an age which rendered them practically useless for continued service; and he did not hesitate to say that there were 5,000, 6,000, or 8,000 of the numbers for the year who ought never to have been taken at all, and would never have been taken in any previous year. In January of the present year, the number of recruits obtained was 4,046; in February, the Order respecting the limit of age was again enforced, and the number fell at once to 2,600, and in March, to 1,712, showing that the number had steadily fallen month by month. In the meantime the recruiting sergeants for the Militia were all over the country, and enlisted 38,000 men for that Force in the year from among the agricultural labourers between 19 and 23 years of age, just the very men that were wanted for the Army. Ours was a military nation, and there would be no difficulty about obtaining proper recruits if the matter was properly gone about. Passing to another point, he would ask what was the condition of our Army organization at the present time? He regretted to say that, in his opinion, its condition was very unsound. Not one of the Army Corps in the country was complete. In not one case had the General who was to be at the head of the Corps, and who was to be responsible for everything, been appointed. A military man, whose opinion he had asked as to the condition of the Commissariat and Transport Service, which it would be remembered had so completely broken down in the Crimean War, had assured him that very few men, even among those connected with that department, knew much about it, so great was the muddle and confusion which prevailed. The facts he had stated, drawn from official sources, showed, he submitted, that the condition of the Army was worse at present than it had been in 1871, and, in particular, that the Reserve had utterly and signally failed. He had shown that during the last three years the expenditure had increased by over £1,000,000; that the number of men in the Regular Army and First Class Reserve was 4,048 fewer than in 1871; that the number of old pensioners—not fighting men—had increased by 4,016; that the number of men constantly in prison had increased in four years by 400; that the number of Army and Militia deserters advertized for had increased since 1871 by 5,471; and that, beyond doubt, thousands of recruits had during the past year been taken who would certainly up to 1876 have been rejected. It was, therefore, impossible for the War Office to declare that that which was black in 1871, and blacker in 1877, could be, as it was sometimes called, rose-colour. He hoped that the House would not vote one penny of the £11,000,000 that remained to be voted for the Army until the Secretary of State for War had clearly stated his opinion on the state of our Forces. He asked the Government whether they were satisfied with our present position with regard to the Army; secondly, did they intend to maintain and encourage the system inaugurated by their Predecessors of forming a Reserve of trained men under 31 years of age, or not; thirdly, if so, how and when they proposed to bring up the number of such Reserves; and, fourthly, if not, what was to be their military policy? His Motion would go in the right direction. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had said, on the 5th March, that—

"The Committee will be pleased to hear that recruits are coming into the Army in such numbers as, I believe, will enable us to fill up our Reserves more expeditiously."—[3 Hansard, cccxxii. 1408.]

If the Motion were carried the number would be but 14,000, which was within the limit of the Vote proposed. He hailed with satisfaction the Amendment that had been placed on the Paper to his Motion, to pass into the Reserve as many men who had served more than three, and less than six years, as could be conveniently spared from their regiments, in order to carry out the original intention of the Army Enlistment Act of 1870, if over 30 years of age. No doubt, the British Army had done great deeds, and won imperishable victories; but they were bound to remember that it was their duty to take care that they maintained their Army in future as their forefathers maintained it in the past. The destinies of the country were in their hands, and it was not only their duty to maintain the Army for the safety of the country, but to maintain it with a due regard to the social advancement that had been made by all classes, as a means of improving rather than of deteriorating their population. He would conclude by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice, which he regarded as extremely moderate and practicable, inasmuch as he only asked the House to assent to what would be the beginning of a sound system.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "having regard to the fact that men of the First Class Army Reserve, when called out last autumn, appeared in a larger proportion than any other branch of Her Majesty's forces, this House is of opinion that it would be expedient to allow at least five thousand men now in barracks, who are over thirty years of age and have had ten years' service, to retire into that reserve,"—(Mr. John Holms,)

—instead thereof.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he was surprised that after the excellent speech which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) had just made, he had concluded with so feeble a Motion. He could scarcely believe the hon. Gentleman to be serious in making that Motion, than which nothing more impotent could be conceived. The Motion, was, in fact, only a peg on which to hang the speech; but there was another Motion which the hon. Gentleman had been twice prevented from bringing before the House, which would have been a better peg for the purpose; because that Motion challenged the soundness of the whole military policy of the late, as well as the present, Secretary of State for War. That Motion raised a distinct issue as to the expediency of remodeling our Army on a new basis. That Motion would have been perfectly intelligible; but the object of the present Motion he (Colonel Alexander) confessed he was totally at a loss to understand. He would refer to a few practical difficulties which were, in his opinion, inseparable from the hon. Gentleman's proposal. The hon. Gentleman now proposed that the Secretary of State for War should transfer into the First Class Army Reserve a number of men not exceeding 5,000, who had completed a service of not more than 10 years with the colours. If these men were to be forced into the Reserve, it would be a monstrous injustice. On the other hand, if they were not to be forced into the Reserve, the hon. Gentleman would find it very difficult to persuade them to sacrifice themselves in order to gratify his fancy. Previous to 1847, enlistment was nominally for life, but practically for 21 years; and there were now in the Army men who had enlisted for life. He knew a man in his own battalion who had enlisted in 1844, and had now completed 33 years' service, and this man had a son serving in the same battalion who had nearly completed 11 years' service. In 1847 the Limited Enlistment Act was passed, under the provisions of which men were enlisted to serve for 10 years, with the option, if approved of by the commanding officers, of re-enlisting for another term of 11 years, in order to complete 21 years' service with the colours. That Act remained in force until the passing of the Short Service Act in 1870. The effect therefore of the hon. Gentleman's proposal would be to transfer into the First Class Army Reserve all men enlisted between the years 1857 and 1867. As he had said, it would be monstrously unjust to force into the Reserve those men who after 10 years' service had elected to serve 11 years longer under the colours. The hon. Gentleman might, perhaps, say that the men would volunteer for the Reserve; but he would certainly be disappointed in that expectation. His (Colonel Alexander's) own experience had satisfied him that they would not do so. After the First Class Army Reserve was initiated, it remained for several years at a merely nominal figure. It was supposed to consist of men who had completed 10 years' service with the colours, and officers were bound to ask their men at the expiration of that period whether they would enlist in the Reserve Force. The reply was almost invariably "No!" A fortiori, men who had enlisted for a further term of 11 years would not be persuaded to join the Reserve. Moreover, if men of this class could be obtained they would never amalgamate with the remainder of the Reserve, for they would be double their age. In his book the hon. Gentleman proposed three years' service with the colours and four with the Reserve, and that at the end of that time every man should pass into civil life. But now the hon. Gentleman proposed to pass into the Reserves men who had seen nearly double that amount of service. Again, the hon. Gentleman had spoken about raw recruits, and he was always lamenting the youth of the Army; but his present proposal would tend to make the Army still younger, and deprive it of the only element which steadied and livened the great mass of youths of whom the Army was composed. The great value of these men was shown by the fact that even now 25 per cent of the recruits for the Line were allowed to be taken for long or 12 years' service. In his (Colonel Alexander's) opinion the only way to obtain a Reserve was by enlisting men, as we were now doing, for six years' service with the colours and six for the Reserve. Men enlisted for service with the colours only would never take kindly to the Reserve. The hon. Gentleman was impatient at the slow progress which the Reserve was making; but it should be remembered that Prussia, to which he referred by way of contrast, had been re-organizing its Army for 50 years. He thought, therefore, we should not be downhearted, because we had not succeeded in filling up our Reserves in six years. It was yet too soon to talk of the deficiency in the Reserves. As he felt quite sure that the element which the hon. Gentleman proposed to infuse into the Reserve would by no means strengthen it, and as the proposal would create the maximum of inconvenience to the Army, with no appreciable advantage to the Reserve, he hoped the House would decline to entertain it.

GENERAL SHUTE considered that a great deal of time was being wasted over a question which was not a very practical one. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) seemed to think that the Army was good for nothing, because of the number of boys it contained. Yet he now proposed to take away the few old soldiers and put them into this, as he appeared to think it, phantom Reserve. We insisted on a purely voluntary enlistment on short service, and we were trying to form a Reserve. Under those circumstances, the only way of getting men of sufficient age was by inducing men in considerable numbers to join the Army from the Militia, and that could only be done by doing what he thought the country would never consent to—namely, balloting for the Militia and keeping it up to its full strength. He hoped shortly to see a revision of the Ballot which he could not but admit in its present form was very objectionable. He would remind the House that in France and Germany no one was allowed to enter the Army until he was 20 years of age; but boys of 15 and 16, nominally 18 and 19 were taken in this country. The fact was, that before 20 every Englishman who was worth his salt had learned a trade, and would not enlist in the Army. To-morrow there would be a large parade at Aldershot of all the troops employed in the Manœuvres. A leading journal said it was a splendid Army, and no doubt the writer of that article was well acquainted with military affairs. He (General Shute) had, however, received a letter from a field officer, who stated that a commanding officer at Aldershot told him he had in his regiment 700 men under one year's service; colour-sergeants of two and three years' service; 300 or 400 recruits at drill, with no men fit to instruct them. The records and office work were frightful, and the regiment was now only a drilling establishment. Deserters went away in squads. Such was the result of short service, for which the present Secretary for War was not responsible. Everyone knew that we had sacrificed a great deal for the Reserve. It was to be hoped that the Reserve was not altogether a myth, and they had had a proof last year that it was not so much of a myth as he and other hon. Members had imagined. He wished that, at all events, some inducement could be found to induce men and not boys to enlist, and that good recruits were more numerous; but all these details had much better be left to the Secretary for War instead of being discussed in the House.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, that what struck him most in the speech of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) was the conclusion, in which he had said a word or two on the Motion itself. He had said a good deal on the subject of prisons and prison labour, but nothing as to the means by which practical effect could be given to his proposition. It seemed to him (Sir Henry Havelock) that the hon. Member's object would be better accomplished by leaving out of his Motion all the words after "expedient," and by inserting these words—

"To pass into the Reserve as many men who have served more than three and less than six years, as can be conveniently spared from their regiments, in order to carry out the original intention of the Army Enlistment Act of 1870."

That was an Amendment of which he (Sir Henry Havelock) had himself given Notice, but which the Rules of the House prevented him from moving. The hon. Member appeared to have changed his views, and was evidently on the horns of a dilemma, for he now agreed that the young soldiers should be passed into the Reserve. He had further said in his book that "real short service had never been tried. That he (Sir Henry Havelock) granted at once; but he could not think it right to pass old soldiers into the Reserve, or to send home men who had received 13 or 14 years' continuous training while the younger men were kept in barracks. [Mr. HOLMS explained that he had not proposed to do so.] The question, however, came to this—Which of the two could best be spared? The young or the old soldier, or did the hon. Member intend them both to pass into the Reserve, in which case there would be no Army? He would venture to criticize one or two of the hon. Member's figures, and would remark that he had certainly not stated the whole case. The British Army, for instance, could not be said to be in a worse state now than in 1871, merely on the strength of the fact that at that time there were 183,000 men in the ranks, and only 3,448 in the Reserve, whereas both these branches were now diminished by about 2,000 men each. Nor was it true that we were now in a worse financial position, because the amount charged for pensions had increased by about £150,000. Surely the hon. Member did not suppose that any one had expected, by initiating in 1870 the formation of a Reserve, that the pension list would be wiped out by 1876? The pensions would necessarily require an increasing sum of money for several years to come. Again, it had been said that in 1874, 1,101 bad characters had been discharged, and that this number had been much larger in 1876—a statement which only meant that the Army machinery had been greatly improved. A "bad character" was simply a man who pursued a trade which the false sentiment of the House itself had done much to foster—namely, that of enlisting from time to time, and who had been at last detected. He was glad to have an opportunity of exposing the delusion which still clung to the word "branded." The hon. Member had spoken of 19,000 such men who had been branded, and had spoken as if it had been done as in former times, when it was done with a hot iron; but such was not the case, for after all, it only came to this—that they were marked "B C" by the perfectly harmless and painless operation of tattooing. As a result, it most certainly had the effect of preventing men enlisting over again. As for the number of these men, it had indeed slightly increased; but the 19,000 deserters of whom the hon. Member spoke represented the accumulation of many years. There was one point on which he was able to agree with the hon. Member, a point which deserved the serious attention of the Secretary for War—namely, that it was matter for regret that the Reserve which both sides of the House had long been endeavouring to form, had not assumed greater proportions. It seemed to be stationary, just as if right hon. Gentlemen had been rolling a stone up a hill, and it was constantly coming back on them. A remedy was required, and the Amendment which stood on the Paper in his name pointed to a remedy; and he hoped a fair trial would be given to it. The fact was, the proportion of exceedingly young men in the Army was so great, that the object of the Act of 1870 could not be accomplished. Lord Cardwell said that in 1883, or 12 years after the Reserve system was begun, he hoped, if his intention was carried into effect, we should have in the Reserve between 60,000 and 70,000 men. In that matter he feared the right hon. Gentleman opposite was not exercising the full powers given him by law, and that he was not resisting as he ought the military pressure put upon him. The Army we had now was one of the youngest Armies in Europe, the great difficulty of commanding officers being to maintain discipline and give anything like formation to those young soldiers. In the Aldershot Division at present the proportion was 35 per cent of men under 15 months' service; he believed he would be right in putting it at 12 months. About a fortnight ago His Royal Highness reviewed some 7,000 men, of whom no fewer than 5,000 were under one year's service. What would be the effect if, out of these regiments you were to take the men of 12 years' service? There would be nothing left to work upon. If the right hon. Gentleman would insist that the men who, after three or four years' service, desired it, should pass into the Reserve, we should soon have a considerable Force. But if we aimed at turning old soldiers into Reserves, we should never have a Reserve Force. One of the most difficult problems we had to solve was how to combine short service with the demands of India, and the sooner the right hon. Gentleman brought that question to an issue, the sooner the country would get something for its money. If the right hon. Gentleman would suggest to the Indian Government that the average service in India should be six years, and not for an indefinite time, he would do better for the Indian Government itself as well as for the Reserves. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney had stated that we were no better off now than we were in 1874. But, in 1874, we had not anything like the Reserve we had at present, which, taking the Militia and Army Reserves together, amounted to some 38,000 men. The real economy would be found in passing men after three or four years' service into the Reserve, and then we should have in them a Force disposable for service in India as well as at home. If the events which occurred in India 20 years ago were to happen now, the 38,000 men we had in the Reserve would be quite available for India at six weeks' notice. There was another point to which he wished to refer, and that was the great objection which young soldiers, as well as old, entertained that their pay was not sufficient to keep them from a state of starvation. Many of the men who passed to the Reserve did not like to go back to their old regiment, and would rather go to another, because they considered their chances better, and he would therefore suggest that it should be made punishable for a man to re-enlist without declaring that he had served before; and if he made the declaration, that he should be allowed to serve in any regiment he liked. He shared in the opinion which had been expressed by his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney that the Reserve ought to become a reality. The Commander-in-Chief had stated, in his examination before the Committee, that he hoped before the end of four years there would be a Reserve of 21,000. He (Sir Henry Havelock) hoped that would be the case; but was of opinion that unless more active measures were taken, the Reserve would not reach that number.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the hon. and gallant Member who had just sat down (Sir Henry Havelock) had connected the Indian with the English Service; but he would not enter into that subject, because it was not connected with the points which had been discussed by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms). He would, however, assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman that he was quite alive to the importance of the subject, and that it was an object at which the War Office was aiming in common with the India Office, and he trusted they were advancing towards the point which the hon. and gallant Gentleman wished to see reached. With reference to the speech of the hon. Member for Hackney, he could not help thinking that it would have been much more appropriate if that hon. Member, instead of concluding as he had done with an impotent Motion, had moved for the impeachment of the late and present Secretary for War, and the complete reversal of our whole military system. The hon. Member had presented a very sad and dreadful view of the British Army—it was composed of the halt and blind, its physical quality had been altogether deteriorated, and it had more sickness and mortality prevailing now than at any former period. The hon. Member, in illustration, had used figures taken from sources which had been refuted over and over again; although he had documents quite at hand which were completely reliable, he went to the police and to The Hus and Cry for information as to the amount of desertions; but that afforded no test as to the true state of the case. There was a document on the Table which gave the official details of desertions, but he did not choose to refer to its details. In 1874, there were 5,582 desertions, but of that number 2,052 returned to the Army, and the total loss was 3,530. In 1875, there were 4,373 desertions, or more than 1,000 less; but 1,944 of those men rejoined the Army, and the net loss was 2,429; and in the year 1876, when there was an increased Force and a greater number of recruits than there ever was before in the history of the Army, the desertions were 4,878, as against 5,582 in 1876; but of those men 2,063 rejoined the Army, so that the actual net loss was 2,815. Now, when the hon. Member had that document in his hand, was it just or fair to go to The Hus and Cry, when the official figures showed that there had been a steady decrease from the year which he took as his normal year? [Mr. J. Holms: I took the year 1871, not 1874, as the normal year.] Certainly the hon. Member took 1874 as the normal year, for he said it would relieve him from all Party considerations, as that was the year when the present Government came into office. He (Mr. Hardy) had not the Returns before him for 1871, but he had for 1872; and in that year the net loss to the Army from desertions was 4,006, therefore it appeared that the further the hon. Member went into his figures the further he went from that position which in all fairness he ought to have placed before the House. With respect to 1871, again he had imposed on the House. In 1871 a Vote was taken by his Predecessor for 20,000 additional men. There were not now so many men in the Army by something like 6,000 men, and the hon. Gentleman was bound to inform the House of the particular circumstances which had occurred in 1870, yet he said not one word about the number of recruits in 1871. Then the hon. Member went into the question of pensions; but he had not adverted to the notorious fact that a great number of 21 years' men who had been enlisted for the Crimean War were just taking their pensions last year. The hon. Member made no allusion to the special circumstances that had occurred, and offered no explanation of the increase of pensions on that account. It was not fair that the House should be so misled. As to crime, the hon. Member had thought it proper to blacken the Army as steeped in crime out of all proportion to the civil population; but the hon. Member had not stated that there were offences in the Army which were peculiar to it, such as insubordination and offences to superior officers—offences which were not known in civil society. Now, though he was sorry to say that there was more crime in the Army than could be wished for, yet these men made capital soldiers in active service, and were as ready to do their duty to their country as others; and he did not think it was wise to make it appear that all the worst characters entered the Army; rather it should be shown to men that there was as good an opportunity of doing as well in the Army as in other positions of life. The hon. Member would prefer men who should be paid 10*s.* a-day; but he must say he did not believe in getting such men by a system of voluntary enlistment. The worst enemies of the Service were those who, like the hon. Member for Hackney, spoke as if men lost their character by entering the Army, and that there was no opportunity of getting on in the Service. He (Mr. Hardy) believed there never was a time when men received better treatment in the Army, or when officers paid more attention to the comfort, character, and condition of the men, or were more anxious that they should succeed. There was the greatest demand for good soldiers as non-commissioned officers. And with reference to crime he would remind the hon. Member for Hackney that Lord Shaftesbury two years ago when the Autumn Manœuvres took place in his neighbourhood, went to see them, and described their conduct as excellent. No offences were committed by them, and it could hardly be known that there was such a body of men in the district. Last year, again, when two Army Corps were mustered, no crimes were committed by those men. The neighbourhood was undisturbed; they were occupied in their military duties, and when released from them their conduct was exemplary; there was no marauding; the neighbourhood was absolutely surprised at the quietness, decorum, and order that prevailed. He had never stated, as the hon. Member seemed to imply, that the 2*d.* a-day of deferred pay would cure desertion; what he stated was that when a man had a considerable sum saved, he was less likely to desert, and he said so still. At any rate it could not affect the present state of things as it could hardly yet be said to be in operation. It was not on that account therefore that desertions were now so low. Desertion in 1876 was extremely low; nevertheless 30,000 men were recruited, and principally from a class which did not deserve the severe reprobation the hon. Member for Hackney had applied to them. With reference to lowering the standard, he believed very few had been enlisted over 30, or below the standard. The hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute) spoke of "young soldiers;" but he (Mr. Hardy) did not believe they would ever get anything but young soldiers in England. The hon. Member for Hackney asked if he (Mr. Hardy) was satisfied with the present system. He was satisfied with nothing so long as improvement could be made. But he believed, if they were to have Reserves, if they were to raise their Army to a point at which they might be satisfied, there was only one way to it—he meant by short service. On the other hand, he never would advocate the using up of all their best men, and then falling back on untried men. The hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir Henry Havelock) spoke of what they should do to prevent desertion. It was pleasant to be praised by one so well able to judge of military matters, but that was exactly what he (Mr. Hardy) was doing. Early in the present year, finding the recruits coming in so numerously, he had directed letters to be written to all the regiments in which there were more than the proper number, directing the officers to offer to place those who had served three years in the Reserve, with the understanding that such men should be well conducted and have the means of gaining their own living. That was a most important thing, as nothing could be worse than to turn out men after three years' service who had nothing to fall back upon for a living. The Reserve pay was not a living, and unless a man had other means of gaining a livelihood you would do him harm rather than good, only tempt him to enlist again, and, in fact, to do much worse. Under that Circular 1,100 men, 746 of whom had fulfilled their first service, had been passed into the Reserve, which on the 1st of April numbered 7,310. He had always said that the formation of a Reserve would be a slow process, but this year he believed they would get from 5,000 to 6,000 men. That brought him to another point to which the hon. Member for Hackney had adverted. The hon. Member had again used the figures of Captain Vivian in that House, which certainly did not apply to the present system. Lord Cardwell, who instituted the present system, never dreamt of putting before the House such figures as those to which the hon. Member alluded. Nor had he (Mr. Hardy) himself ever pretended that they could get up to tens of thousands by this time. He had always said it would be a slow process. Last year the Reserves were coming in very slowly, but he said he thought they would come in in thousands this year, and he was justified in that remark, because the probability was that, as he had stated, they would have between 5,000 and 6,000. But he spoke with diffidence, because he knew that there were many circumstances which might interfere. There were the re-engagements in India, sickness, and many other possibilities. If soldiers were like chessmen, and could be moved at will into the Reserves, the case would be different; but there were circumstances in men's lives which would at times disappoint all calculations. He had always sought to avoid misleading the House by exaggerated expectations in regard to the Reserve, and Lord Cardwell had stated that the utmost they could obtain under that system would be 84,000 men. Then the hon. Member for Hackney, having disparaged the Reserve by comparing it with what he supposed it would be, but what it was never intended to be, went on to the Militia recruiting, and complained that they had got 38,000 men for the Militia last year. No commanding officer of Militia would echo that complaint. The men in these days knew perfectly well what they were enlisting for, whether it was for long or for short service, whether it was for any particular arm of the Service, and certainly whether it was for the Militia or for the Line. The fact was that those who enlisted for the Militia were a different class from those who enlisted for the Line, and although the Militia was an admirable school for the Line, it did not at all disturb enlistment for the Army. Those who went into the Militia knew it was a different service altogether, but it gave many of them a taste for soldiering; they found it more agreeable than they expected, and they passed into the Line. He could not, however, say that the Militia was to be relied upon as an auxiliary to the Reserve. Next, the hon. Member attacked the Commissariat. Up to that point he had been very diligent with his figures; but when he came to the Commissariat he described it as a combination of meddle and muddle, on no higher authority than a letter which he quoted from some one who knew nothing about it, and who wrote for information to someone who knew less, and he added that people in that department were so dissatisfied that they really could not tell him anything about it, and that, therefore, it was in a bad state, and could never come to any good. Now, he (Mr. Hardy) was far from saying himself that the Commissariat did not require improvement. He had made changes in regard to the Control department; he did not despair, if he was let alone, of yet making a better business of the Commissariat; and he hoped the hon. Member for Hackney would quote a correspondent next year who knew something about it, and who found it not nearly so bad as he had supposed it to be, and that, on the whole, the country got all that it could reasonably expect. He agreed with the hon. Member on the unhappy condition of things resulting from getting volunteers from regiments low down in the roster to fill up those which were at the top. Last year the House, with great wisdom, filled up the first 18 regiments to 820 men. But they must see that in the first year those regiments must be full of recruits. It would not be wise or just to send on service regiments which had many recruits in them; and, therefore, it would be necessary to get men from regiments which were lower on the roster. The men could be easily obtained by means of a bounty; and he trusted that those regiments would be better filled up as time went on, and that there would be men in them who had served longer. But in the case of regiments that had many young men it would be advisable to leave those young men with the depôts at home, and fill up their places with older men. With respect to Army Reserve men and Militia Reserve men, he should be disposed to keep them for a second re-inforcement rather than put them immediately into the first line. But that was a point which would have to be considered hereafter. It had been found necessary to divide recruiting for the Army into long and short service, and it was said that there would be no taste in the country for short service; but the fact had turned out exactly the reverse, because the proportion who enlisted for short service was much greater than that which enlisted for long service. He was sorry, to some extent, for that; because, with a view to those who remained, it was important to have a certain number of long-service men for the position of non-commissioned officers, and this disposition towards short service had interfered with the supply. Still, would it, he asked, be wise, under the difficulties in which they found themselves, to rush suddenly to another extreme, because, as had been pointed out, the hon. Member for Hackney had changed his front this year? They used to hear of men with one year's service; but if they had such a system as that, in what state would their regiments be, and how fit would they be for service? But, again, would it be desirable wholly to rely on three years' service? If the three years' service men had the means of supporting themselves in civil life, that might be desirable; but to cut down the six years to three years would be a most objectionable system. The new view of the hon. Member in regard to the Reserve was an extraordinary one. If they took those 10 years' men, as the hon. Member suggested, in three years they would be free from the Reserve, because 12 years was the outside period for which the hon. Member thought a man ought to be called upon to serve. The hon. Gentleman asked when and how they would form a Reserve? There was but one way, and that was the method they were adopting. He admitted it was a slower method than he could desire; but it was the only one—namely, by passing the men through the ranks of the Army. They must take those who wished to stay till the end of six years. As it stood, they would get some 12 years' men, and as three years' training in the Army was a very sufficient training, their nine years' men would prove effective. He did not despise the Militia Reserve, which he believed was one to which the country might look with very considerable confidence. He did not say it would be wise to place it at once into the front ranks; but after a few weeks' training it could be made fit to be put side by side with the soldiers of the Line. If that was so, they had practically at that moment a Reserve of 35,000 men available, and that was more than people looked forward to five or six years ago. The actual Reserve of men who had passed through the Army was this year beginning really to increase. If they got their 5,000 or 6,000 men this year—and it was really the first year in which the system had had a fair trial—they might calculate that they had fairly begun; that it would go on, and yield them 5,000 or 6,000 annually. Though slow, it was safe; every man would be well trained, and fit to take his position beside the soldiers of the Line in any ranks or places to which they wished to send them. Had not this country gone through a very long military probation? It had not a vast force of Regular troops in its Service always ready to take the field; but it had trained a great number of men who, although they had not gone through the ranks, would be available for the service of the country at any moment. Moreover, it was to be borne in mind that in their Second Reserve they had some 24,000 who, though they might not be fit for active service in the field, yet would be quite available for garrison duty, and would prove a great stay to our Volunteers, who would also, he believed, do good service. He could not hesitate to express the opinion that, in addition to the 170,000 or 180,000 men we would have at our disposal, there would be 500,000 or 600,000 who, having passed through the Volunteer Service, would be able to render effective aid, if the country were put on its defence. He also expected that we should find young men to send abroad, for the military spirit which had been invoked by the Volunteers had produced such an effect that, so far from there being a difficulty in getting men to send abroad, his belief was that a greater number in proportion to the population would be ready to rush to the front than on any former occasion. He might be wrong, but that was his opinion, taking into account the military spirit which had been called forth in the country within the last 20 years. He must apologize to the House for having trespassed upon its time so long, and for the minuteness with which he had gone into the question. But he wished to part with all good will from the hon. Member for Hackney, of whom he had said some hard things, but who also had used some strong expressions with regard to him, which certainly were not undeserved if he had been guilty of all that had been laid to his charge. But, be they little or much deserved, he could assure the hon. Gentleman he would forgive him for all that had fallen from him in the course of his speech.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he was anxious that the House should get into Committee, and he would not, therefore, occupy much time. While generally concurring in the main object which the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) had in view, he must express his dissent from many of the assertions which he had made. His hon. Friend had said that the promises which had been held out at the time the Short Service Act was passed had not been fulfilled, and had called up the ghost of Captain Vivian's figures, which had been laid again and again, in support of the statement. Now, he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) was anxious, not only for the sake of Captain Vivian, but of the Government with which he was connected, to explain in what circumstances those figures had been quoted. His hon. Friend stated that the House of Commons was asked in 1870 to pass the Short Service Act, and that Captain Vivian had promised that in eight years after the institution of the system the Reserve would reach 81,811. These figures, however, had not been quoted as one of the conditions of the passing of the Bill, and, indeed, were not quoted until 1871, when the scheme of Army reform which had been propounded by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), and which had been examined by the actuaries of the War Office, was under consideration, and found to be utterly impracticable. It was then, in contrast with the noble Lord's proposal, that Captain Vivian stated what, under certain circumstances, would be the result of the Short Service Act. But those particular circumstances had never come into existence, and the proportion of short service men, which Captain Vivian's statement pre-supposed, and which he expressly quoted as the basis of his calculations, had never yet been enlisted. And lest it should be thought, after all that had been said by his hon. Friend, that there was now, after all, no Reserve in the country, it might be well to state the fact that in 1870, 2,400 men—in round numbers—were enlisted for short service; in 1871, 9,000; in 1872, 10,000; in 1873, nearly 10,000; in 1874, nearly 13,000; and in 1875, 13,000; making, in all, up to the close of 1875—the latest year for which we had an official Return—57,693. So that he presumed they must have at that moment at least 70,000 or 80,000 men serving in the Army, all of whom—subject to the usual casualties—would pass into the Reserve. Those were important facts which the hon. Member seemed to have overlooked. No one could deny that the formation of a complete system of Reserves required time; but he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) trusted the right hon. Gentleman and his military advisers would strive to accomplish the task as soon as possible.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he stood up in defence of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms), who deserved great credit for the attention with which he studied the condition of the British Army, and urged the importance of rendering it in all respects an efficient Force. With regard to the Reserve, the hon. Member for Hackney referred to the German system, and indicated how well it worked. No doubt, the German system was based on compulsory, as well as universal liability for some military service, by all the fit youths of the country; but as compulsion was impossible in the present state of feeling in this country, there was no reason why the views of the hon. Member for Hackney in favour of an extension of our short service system should not be favourably considered, and, if deemed suitable for our Army, extended to a far greater extent than hitherto applied. He agreed that if the principle that short service and an effective Reserve growing out of it was the best thing for the Army and for this country, then, to his mind, the number of old soldiers comprised in it was perfectly alarming, assuming the German system and the present short service of this country to be sound in principle. This was the essence of the opinion avowed by the hon. Member for Hackney, and it was a question of the gravest importance, deserving of the fullest investigation. It had never been properly inquired into by either of the Commissioners on recruiting, though it well merited the serious attention of a Select Committee of this House. He therefore cordially and heartily supported the hon. Member in his earnest endeavour to induce the House of Commons to take up this question of the highest national importance.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 207; Noes 46: Majority 161.—(Div. List, No. 192.)

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," proposed.

ARMY—NUMERICAL TITLES OF LINE REGIMENTS.—OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL NAGHTEN rose to speak to a Resolution of which he had given Notice, but which he was prevented by the Rules of the House from moving, namely—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient to adopt the recommendations of the Militia Committee as far as regards the discontinuance of numerical titles for regiments."

The hon. and gallant Member appealed to the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms), as he had already spoken for an hour and three-quarters, not to move his Amendment, as it might lead to a long discussion, and the Government was anxious to get some Votes in Supply. He impressed upon the House that anything to lessen esprit de corps was to be deprecated, and called attention to what he considered would be most unpopular—for any Government to take away the numbers of such regiments as the 42nd, 79th, and other distinguished regiments, and warned the authorities not to trifle with cherished regimental distinctions. He said that if Lord Cardwell's scheme was carried out in its entirety, such a regiment as the Rifle Brigade which recruited chiefly in the Seven Dials and Tower Hamlets districts, would have to be called the "Seven Dials Regiments," and the officers would have to be selected from those localities. He would conclude by quoting what he said his hon. Friends opposite would agree with him were good Conservative remarks—namely, an answer given before the Committee by His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief (No. 8,621, p. 316.)—

"I think that in these things it is better to leave well alone. We have done very well as we are; anything in the way of a change is objectionable. What is the advantage of it? If there is no advantage, leave things alone, I should say."

General Sir George Balfour

MR. STANLEY observed that when the Report of the Military Forces Localization Committee was under discussion there was no manifestation of the feeling against the change to which his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Winchester (Colonel Naghten) had adverted, but he was bound to admit that it gave rise to considerable discussion in the public Press, and that many regiments protested against being linked with other regiments. When his right hon. Friend came into office as Secretary of State for War he had found the Military Forces Localization Scheme fairly started. Out of the £3,500,000 which, after a prolonged discussion, Parliament had granted, on the strength of Lord Cardwell's scheme, it was found that a sum of £176,000 had been already expended, and that liabilities had been contracted amounting to £1,500,000. A number of Brigade Depôts had also been established, and various contracts had been entered into. The Secretary of State for War, even if he had been so minded, could not have stopped the scheme, but though he could not stop it, he was bound to satisfy himself as to the details which were propounded in it. In July, 1875, a Committee was therefore appointed to inquire into and report upon the working of the Brigade Depôts, and that Committee was subsequently merged in the Militia Committee. As had already been remarked, the double battalion system was one of the points upon which Lord Cardwell laid stress in bringing the localization scheme before Parliament. There were few countries which clung to the single battalion system so long as ourselves. The plural battalion system had previously been adopted with evident advantage by other countries, and it was when the changed conditions of service rendered it necessary to have battalions of low strength at home and of high strength abroad that Lord Cardwell resolved upon the change. It was not usual to appeal to the personnel of a Committee; but he could do so with confidence in the present case, and he denied most positively that they were men who were insensible to the importance of preserving the esprit de corps of regiments or the advantages of territorial associations. They felt, however, that the double battalion system had become a necessity. The question they had to ask themselves was whether we had so many men that we could dispense with the means of making the most of them? Almost everything had to be sacrificed to organization, and grave and serious as were the changes recommended, the Committee felt that they would not be performing their duty if they did not make the recommendations specified in their Report. They thought the connection should be closer between the Line and the Militia regiments, and that a territorial designation should be selected. It was proposed to do away with the sub-district numbers, and to designate the sub-district brigade by the name of its head quarters.

EARL PERCY rose to call attention to the pay and allowances of majors of the Royal Artillery, who had been promised by the late Secretary of State for War (Lord Cardwell) that they should be placed on an equality with majors of the Line, and were still paid only 14s. 6d. a-day instead of 16s. A major in the Line received forage allowance always, but a major in the Royal Artillery received it only when actually performing mounted duty. In one case, of which he had the details, an officer of the Royal Artillery had, in the course of 5 years and 10 months' nine changes from duty in which he received that allowance to duty in which he did not receive it. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to hold out some hope that a promise which had been given by a Secretary of State and sanctioned by Parliament should be adhered to in its entirety.

MR. PRICE also rose to call attention to the case of Militia Quartermasters with reference to their retiring allowances. His object was to ask the right hon. Gentleman to take into consideration whether it was not desirable to get rid of the old and worn-out Quartermasters who were still serving, and who could not be expected to retire on the present allowances, and introduce new ones as rapidly as possible, but not on the present scale of pensions, because it would be unfair to those who would have to retire. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether he could not offer the older Quartermasters some inducement to retire. They would be content with a very small addition to the existing allowance of 4s. a-day.

COLONEL KINGSCOTE urged the same view, adding that it would be a great advantage to the Service if those officers could retire.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the question of the Quartermasters had been under consideration, and an arrangement had been practically made by which an improvement would be effected with regard to them. The details were not yet settled; but he hoped to be able soon to communicate them to the House. As the pay of Majors of the Royal Artillery had been taken by the House into its own hands, it would not be necessary for him to make any remarks on the subject.

CAPTAIN O'BEIRNE called attention to the injustice of compelling officers to buy and forage, at their own expense, horses they were compelled to keep for the public services.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL believed that in the English Service the pay of Cavalry officers was greater than that given in other countries, and that no good reason had been shown for an increase of allowance for forage or for buying horses. Since the year 1810 the forage had been almost entirely supplied by the Commissariat, and it had always been customary for officers to buy their own horses. He did not believe they had any cause to complain of injustice under the present arrangement.

CAPTAIN NOLAN urged the hardship of the position of Senior Chaplains, who were obliged to retire at 60 years of age without full pensions.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that though many persons who had to retire at 60 felt that they were still fit for work, the thing should not be looked upon in that way only; it should be looked upon also with reference to those below. Unless that was done, there could be no flow of promotion.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, it was now five minutes to 1 o'clock, and there being 32 Orders of the Day on the Paper to be disposed of, he objected to any more Votes being taken. He would therefore move that the Chairman report Progress.

LAW AND JUSTICE—SURREY ASSIZES QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ONSLOW asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether it is intended always to limit the duration of the Surrey Assizes to six days; and, why the county of Surrey should be the only one exempted from the statutory rule which allows suitors to name the county or place in which they propose that their actions shall be tried?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he could assure the noble Earl that Surrey was not excepted from the statutory rules referred to. Every suitor had a perfect right to name any county where his action might be tried; but, on the other hand, there was another right on the part of the Judge. If he found an action set down for trial in a county which had no connection with the case, he had power to send it back to the county to which it really belonged. This was obviously a very desirable power—parties might, for instance, be so ill-advised as to set down an action which belonged to Northumberland for hearing in Cornwall—it would, indeed, be an evil if the Judge had not power to send it to the county where it could properly be tried. What had been done with regard to Surrey was this—Before the Judicature Act passed and the present arrangements for continuous sittings in London and Middlesex were made, the practice was that all sittings in London or in Middlesex for the trial of jury cases came to an end towards the end of June, when the learned Judges went upon Circuit. From the time the Judges went on Circuit about the end of June until the following November there were no means of trying cases in London or Middlesex. The result of that was that where there was any case pressing for trial the plaintiff set it down for trial at Guildford or Croydon, or any other place near London, rather than have it thrown over till November. But one of the great objections to that practice was that in Croydon or Guildford 100, 200, or 300 cases, perhaps, were set down for trial that had nothing whatever to do with the county of Surrey, and which would have been tried in London if there had been the means of trying them in London. That practice involved great expense in the sending down of witnesses. As a remedy, it was suggested that, Surrey being so very near London, the Surrey Assizes might be dispensed with altogether, and the Surrey cases and the Surrey prisoners be brought to London for the purpose of trial. The county of Surrey objected very much to that; and in consequence of that objection it was arranged that two of the learned Judges who were left for the continuous sittings in London and Middlesex should go down to Surrey and continue the Surrey Assizes for the purpose of trying the Surrey cases. That arrangement worked very well for some time. What had happened lately was this. There was a very considerable number of cases to be tried in London and Middlesex, and it occurred to some solicitors in London that they might get a trial of them by abstaining from putting them down for trial in the regular list and putting them down for trial in Surrey. The consequence was that very suddenly a considerable number of cases were put down for trial at Guildford or Croydon, which had no connection whatever with the county of Surrey. Of course, to the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Grove, the learned Judges who were to hold the Surrey Assizes, it was a matter of indifference whether they sat in London or at Croydon; but it was a serious matter that, by moving it to Croydon, London business should be taken out of its proper turn. The learned Judges had, therefore, announced that they would allow an adequate number of days for the disposal of the business connected with the County, and that they would hold themselves free as to the remainder of the cases.

QUESTIONS.

OBSCENE PUBLICATIONS—LORD CAMPBELL'S ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the case of The Queen v. Hicklin, whereby the Court of Queen's Bench decided the pamphlet called "The Confessional Unmasked" to be an obscene publication within the meaning of the Act 20 and 21 Vic. (Lord Campbell's Act) and prohibited its sale and publication, Whether the Government will introduce a Bill declaring such Act "to apply exclusively to works written for the single purpose of corrupting the morals of youth, &c." (as stated by Lord Campbell to be the intention of his Act)?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: In reply to the Question of the hon. Member, I beg to state that on examination of the case referred to, "The Queen v. Hicklin," I find that the Recorder of Wolverhampton found that half The Confessional Unmasked was obscene, and that the indiscriminate publication of it was calculated to prejudice good morals; but that the defendant did not keep or sell the copies of the work for gain, but to expose the Confessional. The Court of Queen's Bench on these findings held that, notwithstanding the object the defendant had in view, the publication in question was a misdemeanour, and that an indictment would lie. As the law stands, therefore, it would seem that the publication of an obscene book is an offence, though the person publishing it was not actuated by any desire to deprave, and the book was not written with that object. The law, in fact, desires to prevent the minds of the people being polluted, and is not careful to consider the motives of the polluter or the means to which he resorts. On the whole, the Government sees no necessity for any alteration in the law on this subject.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE CONFESSIONAL.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Vice President of the Council, with reference to recent disclosures of certain doctrines and practices under the name of "Confessional," carried out by Ministers of the Established Church associated for that purpose under the name of Holy Cross, or otherwise, Whether he is aware of any such Minister being now recognized by his Department as having charge or control over public schools; and, if so, whether any and what steps will be taken to protect the public against the propagation of such doctrines and practices under the name of education?

VISCOUNT SANDON: I would remind the hon. Gentleman that the Education Department has no authority to deal with the religious teaching and observances of public elementary schools, beyond insisting upon a strict adherence to all the provisions of the Conscience Clause, which provides, in addition to other securities for the rights of conscience, that a parent may withdraw his child from any religious teaching or observance. Beyond this, none of the Acts which we administer give us any authority to inquire into the doctrines or practices of the managers of the schools which receive our annual grants, be they Board, Church of England, or Roman Catholic. Nor do they enable us to interfere with the constitution of the governing bodies of the schools. Under these circumstances, I cannot think that I have either the right or the power to make the inquiries which would alone enable me to answer the hon. Gentleman's Question. I trust, however, that the House will not think that I in any way undervalue the gravity and importance of the subject to which the hon. Gentleman has called attention.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—LORD DERBY'S DESPATCH OF MAY 6.

QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is prepared to name the "European Nations" referred to in the Despatch of the 6th of May, which concur in or may be expected to support the policy indicated therein, namely, that Russia shall restrict her operations to certain portions of the Ottoman Empire?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The passage in Lord Derby's despatch of May 6 to which the hon. Gentleman appears to refer is this—

"The mercantile and financial interests of European nations are also so largely involved in Egypt that an attack on that country, or its occupation, even temporarily, for the purposes of war, could scarcely be regarded with unconcern by the neutral Powers—certainly not by England.

Now, I do not think I should be justified in taking up the time of the House by enumerating all the European nations which have mercantile or financial interests in Egypt. It would have been shorter, perhaps, to mention those which have not—only, unfortunately, I have not been able to find any.

NAVY—DESIGNS OF SHIPS OF WAR.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether with reference to the Committee of Inquiry into the designs of ships of war of Her Majesty's Navy, he will now consent to the appointment of the promised Committee without further postponement?

MR. A. F. EGERTON, in reply, said, that the First Lord of the Admiralty, after a full consideration of the reasons alleged for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the designs of ships of war of Her Majesty's Navy, had come to the conclusion that he could not consent to the appointment of such Committee.

PARLIAMENT — ORDER — COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU wished to call attention to a point of Order. It seemed to him there was a mistake in the Votes sent round that morning. At No. 45 the Resolution was recorded, "That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply." This Resolution, however, did not preclude a long debate before going into Committee. It was moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," but an Amendment to this was agreed to; and thereafter it was again moved and resolved—as given at No. 47 in the Votes—"That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply." If it was against the practice of the House—as he contended it was—that the same Motion should be put twice, it was desirable that the Votes should be altered in case this occurrence might be drawn into a precedent. The effect of allowing the Motion in question to be put over and over again would be to take from the House the Constitutional power of stopping Supply.

MR. SPEAKER: It is right I should state to the House that when a Motion is made that this House do immediately resolve itself into Committee of Supply the object of that Motion is to "set up" Committee of Supply, and for no other purpose. That Motion is followed in ordinary course, after Committee of Supply is "set up," by a Motion that I now leave the Chair. That course was taken last night, and the proceeding is entirely in accordance with the Rules of the House. I therefore see no ground for the alteration of the Votes, as proposed by the noble Lord. It appears to me the noble Lord scarcely attaches sufficient weight to the consideration that there are two Motions before the House. One is that Committee of Supply should be "set up," which is done by the first Motion "that this House do immediately resolve itself into Committee of Supply," and when that Motion has been carried it is followed by a second Motion "that I now leave the Chair." And there is no reason why, on the same night, the Motion that this House do resolve itself into Committee of Supply should not be made as often as the House thinks fit, thereby affording additional facilities for the discussion of grievances.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE
(IRELAND) (re-committed) BILL—[BILL 184.]
(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 22nd June.]
Bill considered in Committee.

PART I.

Constitution and Judges of Court of Judicature.

Clause 6 (Constitution of High Court of Justice in Ireland).

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK moved the omission of a portion of the clause providing—

"That when first after the commencement of this Act one of the existing Judges of the Landed Estates Court shall die, resign, or otherwise vacate his office, the vacancy thus occasioned shall not be filled up until a Commission shall have been issued by Her Majesty under her Royal Sign Manual to ascertain and report whether the business in connexion with the Division of the High Court of Justice (herein-after termed the Chancery Division) makes it requisite that such appointment should be made, nor until the expiration of a period of forty days after the date of such report, if Parliament be then sitting, and if Parliament be not then sitting, until the expiration of a period of forty days after the commencement of the then next Session of Parliament."

The hon. and learned Gentleman said, that according to the succeeding clause of the Bill, the jurisdiction exercised by the Judges of the Landed Estates Court was to continue to be exercised by them or their successors, or, in case of illness, absence, or vacancy, by any other Judge of the Chancery Division of the High Court; that if the state of business permitted they should be bound to assist from time to time in the general business of the Chancery Division; that they were to be Judges of the Chancery Division. He objected to the proposed appointment of a Commission, and pointed out the inconvenience that might arise from the adoption of such a provision, especially in a case where one of the Judges of the Landed Estates Court might be incapacitated from discharging his duties at the time his brother Judge had been sent to discharge duties at the Assizes or to perform other functions that were superadded to his department.

He failed to see the practical utility of such a Commission, and thought that the only question really to be considered was whether the Committee would be justified in imposing so many new duties on the Judges of the Landed Estates Court. If the Government thought the number of Judges ought to be reduced, and could show good ground for so thinking, he should not oppose a provision giving power to reduce the number in case of necessity.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, that unquestionably a large and increased jurisdiction was by this Bill given to the Judges of the Landed Estates Court. A second Judge had been appointed for that Court; but the Government desired to retain the power of issuing a Commission, when a vacancy occurred, to consider whether it was necessary to maintain a second Judgeship. He trusted his hon. and learned Friend would not press his Amendment to a division.

MR. GOLDNEY opposed the Amendment.

MR. LAW said, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed, as it was impossible to say, until they saw how the new machinery worked, whether it would or would not be desirable to retain two Judges of the Court in question.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, as the Government were unwilling to accept it, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BIGGAR (for Mr. PARNELL) moved, in page 5, line 8, to leave out from "until" to "next Session of Parliament." He said, the object was to make it imperative not to appoint another Judge, and he added that much wonderment had been created as to the grounds on which appointments already made had been ordered.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, this Amendment was the exact converse of the one which had been previously moved. He opposed it on the ground that the Government ought to retain the power of re-considering the whole question when a vacancy occurred. The matter had come before the House in July, 1875, and there had then been little difference of opinion, the hon. Member for King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien) and others remarking on the inconvenience arising from the want of a second Judge.

MR. PARNELL said, he was sorry that he was not present in time to move the Amendment. Judge Flanagan had written to the Government saying that he was quite capable of discharging all the duties of the Landed Estates Court, and therefore there was no necessity for making the appointment; yet, for reasons that never appeared, the Government appointed a second Judge to the Landed Estates Court, in the teeth of the remonstrance of Judge Flanagan. Judge Flanagan also said that in 1875 he had only sat 87 days out of 365, and notwithstanding the short time he sat he had time to work off a considerable portion of the arrears left to him by his predecessor.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, much of the work of the Landed Estates Court was done at home, and consisted in the reading up of titles to estates and so forth, a mistake in which would be irreparable. It was also proposed to abolish the office of Receiving Master, and all his work would have to be performed by the Judges of the Landed Estates Court.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he thought that members of the Irish Bar could not be taunted with selfishness in the matter, though it was one of much interest to them. He held that many of the duties at present performed by the Judge were merely clerical and ministerial. As long as these merely routine tasks were thrown upon him there would be need for the additional Judge whose appointment was now questioned. He could not support the Amendment, because he thought it would not be wise to take action in the matter before they found out whether the alterations made in the Bill would or would not increase the work which would have to be performed by the Judges of the Landed Estates Court.

MR. MORRIS said, he did not think there was a harder working member at the Bar than the Receiving Master of the business of the Landed Estates Court. He thought it would be found necessary to have two Judges to perform the work in an efficient manner.

MR. MELDON said, that was not the first time that the hon. Member for

Mr. Serjeant Sherlock

Meath (Mr. Parnell) had brought forward the question of the appointment of a second Judge to the Irish Landed Estates Court, but he had never heard any arguments offered in support of the work really requiring two Judges to discharge it. He knew that the newly appointed Judge, Mr. Ormsby, was a most painstaking Judge—that he had given satisfaction to the suitors at the Bar, the Profession, and the public since his appointment; but the question was whether or not a second Judge should have been appointed.

Mr. LAW also defended the appointment of Judge Ormsby as a man very well suited to the position which he now filled.

Mr. PARNELL said, the reason for the Amendment was that there were not sufficient causes in the Landed Estates Court to fully occupy two Judges. That was proved by the Government now proposing to throw upon their shoulders additional duties. What he complained of was that the judicial staff of Ireland was too large. He was told by a person highly qualified to give an opinion that six Judges would be sufficient; but under the Bill there were to be 11, and all he wanted to do was to reduce the number to 10.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 7 (As to Judges of Landed Estates Court.)

Mr. PARNELL moved, in page 6, line 6, to leave out all the words from after "Judges," to the word "Judges," in line 8, inclusive, and insert—

"All rules made in pursuance of this section shall be laid before each House of Parliament within such time, and shall be subject to be annulled in such manner, as is in the sixty-seventh section of this Act provided."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8 (As to Judges of Court of Bankruptcy.)

Mr. PARNELL moved, in page 6, after line 19, to insert—

"Provided always, That when first after the commencement of this Act one of the existing judges of the Court of Bankruptcy shall die, resign, or otherwise vacate his office, the vacancy thus occasioned shall not be filled up until a commission shall have been issued by Her Majesty under Her Royal Sign Manual to ascertain and report whether the business in connection with the Court of Bankruptcy makes it requisite that such appointment should be made, nor until the expiration of a period of forty days after the date of such report, if Parliament be then sitting, and if Parliament be not then sitting, until the expiration of a period of forty days after the commencement of the then next Session of Parliament."

This Amendment merely proposed that the provisions adopted with regard to the Landed Estates Court should apply to the Court of Bankruptcy also.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. MELDON hoped his hon. Friend would withdraw the Amendment. The case of the Bankruptcy Court was quite different from the Landed Estates Court. The Judges of the Bankruptcy Court had as much as they could do, and their work was continually increasing. If local Bankruptcy Courts were instituted, then would be the time to consider whether the Judges of the Court of Bankruptcy should be so relieved of their duties that only one Judge would be necessary. In 1874 the two Judges had 5,602 sittings, and in 1875 these sittings had increased to 6,936; and, besides these, the Chief Registrar had 3,000 or 4,000 sittings annually. The hon. Gentleman paid a compliment to the efficiency of the staff, to whose skill it was owing that the costs of winding-up estates were so very small in Ireland.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, that the statement of the hon. Member for Kildare had clearly shown that the quantity of business in the Bankruptcy Court was so great that it could not be done by one Judge. The whole scope of the present Bill was to leave the Bankruptcy Court, which was found to work very well, exactly as it was for the present. When local courts with bankruptcy jurisdiction were established, then would be the time to consider whether one Judge in Dublin would not be sufficient to administer the business of the Court.

Mr. BIGGAR supported the Amendment. The argument was not that the Bankruptcy Judges had too little business at present, but that it was very probable that a clause in another Bill would give bankruptcy jurisdiction to local Courts in Ireland, and then the work to be done in Dublin would be greatly reduced.

Dr. WARD maintained that the Irish Bench was greatly over-manned. If they passed a County Courts Bill they would take away a great deal of the business from the higher Courts. In Ireland there were 24 Judges of the first instance against 20 such Judges in England, and 12 Common Law Judges in Ireland against 18 in England. The whole question came to this—were they to maintain all these Judges merely to please the Bar until Government modified their Bill by appointing a Commission of Inquiry into the business performed by the Judges? He must oppose the Bill. The judgments in Ireland numbered 4,481, against 23,543 in England, so that the amount of business done in England was enormously beyond that done in Ireland. He commented on the eagerness of the Members of the Irish Bar for obtaining Government appointments.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, these statistics, if his ears did not deceive him, had been given by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) on the day when the Bill was last before the House. He thought that two Judges were at present necessary, but that before any vacancy was filled up a Commission should be appointed to say whether a second Judge was necessary.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked whether the hon. Member for Galway (Dr. Ward) would like the principle he laid down applied to the Medical Profession? When he heard the hon. Gentleman apply it to that Profession then he should believe in his doctrine. He maintained that if the views which had been expressed by the hon. Members near him were carried out the Bench and the Bar would be provincialized and degraded. Were it not that there existed the possibility of obtaining eventually those higher appointments, men of the ability and legal knowledge now practising at the Bar in Ireland would relinquish their practice in Ireland and betake themselves to the English Bar, thus lowering the character of the profession in Ireland, and inflicting deep and lasting injury on suitors in Ireland. He held that the Bar in Dublin was a credit to Ireland, and he hoped the Committee would recognize the character of the Bar and Bench and maintain it. He did not believe the views of the people of Ireland would approve of a reduction of the Judges.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH reminded the Committee that the discussion was taking too wide a scope. The question before them was whether the Irish Bankruptcy Court should be left untouched for the present as proposed by the Bill.

MR. SULLIVAN said, the hon. Baronet (Sir Patrick O'Brien) appeared to lay it down that whether they wanted the Judges or not they had better keep them, because it brought the money there. That was a corrupting influence, and the hon. Baronet belonged to an antediluvian school of Irish politics if he thought now-a-days they could carry on corruption. [SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN rose to Order. He had not spoken of corruption.] No; the hon. Baronet had shrunk from that, but that was what it was. He called it public corruption when public officials were maintained out of public money, and their services were not bona fide required for the discharge of public duties. Why were they, in the name of patriotism, to pay officials in Ireland, whether they were wanted or not? Ireland did not want, either in the name of patriotism or any other name, that public money should be spent in any such manner, and the Department of all others that should be kept free from reproach was that of the seat of justice. The worst mode of expending public money was by applying political patronage to the justice seat, on the ground that it was good money spent in the country. The bankruptcy business in Ireland, they were now told, was increasing; but when other questions were under discussion relating to Ireland, they were told that Ireland, of all countries under the sun, was the home of happiness and prosperity, and that bankruptcy was scarcely known there. Taken as a whole, there was no Judicature throughout the world so free from imputation that would detract from the dignity that belonged to the seat of justice. He was afraid, however, that it was made in Ireland too much the reward of political attachment, rather than of intellectual attainments.

MR. GOLDNEY said, the question was not whether there were sufficient Judges of high attainments in Ireland, but whether the bankruptcy department in that country should remain as at present for some little time longer.

MR. LAW denied on the part of the Irish Bar that they had any desire to multiply judicial places. He did not believe that an extravagant distribution of Imperial money was beneficial for Ireland. He certainly should be surprised to learn that any secret negotiations had taken place between the members of the Irish Bench and the Government in relation to this Bill. The complaint in Ireland was that there had not been sufficient communication between the Government and the Judicial Bench of Ireland before these great changes were proposed. The proper time, however, for the consideration of such a proposition as that before the Committee would be when the Bill, to be brought in hereafter, dealing with bankruptcy, was under discussion. There was sufficient bankruptcy business at present in Ireland to occupy the time of two Judges. He should oppose the Amendment.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER, while concurring with the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) in the opinion that the number of Judges ought not to exceed that which was necessary for the due administration of justice, thought it extremely desirable, seeing how much of our law was Judge-made, that they should not be called upon to work under high pressure, and, in consequence, perhaps decide cases imperfectly. The number of Judges in this country had been a few years ago, in accordance with the economical suggestions of the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), reduced by one or two, and the result was that additional Judges were now called for. Ireland, he might add, was improving, and as that improvement went on its judicial business would increase in importance. It would be but a niggardly policy therefore, he thought, to diminish the number of Judges in that country. He should oppose the Amendment.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he totally and completely disclaimed that he had based his argument on the principle of corruption. He was as free from that commodity as the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan). He had not based his remarks upon any question of patriotism — patriotism he regarded as something too sacred to be estimated by considerations of pounds, shillings, and pence. He regretted to say it was but too often employed in that House and elsewhere upon trivial matters completely unworthy of its application to them. He had long since ceased to be connected with the Bar, and had no personal interest in it, but as an Irishman he revered it as having trained men whose genius, eloquence, and integrity shed lustre on his country.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS expressed his regret that the question of bankruptcy jurisdiction was not dealt with in either of the Irish legal Bills before the House, and said that the mere promise of a measure on the subject some two or three years hence was regarded with great dissatisfaction in the part of Ireland which he represented.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER expressed dissatisfaction at the conduct of the Government in regard to this measure, for this reason—that this was the third time that the Irish Government had attempted to pass this Bill. The Judiciary establishment in Ireland was so overstocked at present that one out of every three bond fide practising lawyers in Dublin might fairly count upon filling a Government situation. He did not mean one out of every three called to the Bar, but one out of every three who had the ghost of a chance of being appointed. They had seen the effects in that plethora of appointments in the history of many distinguished Irish lawyers who had got into the House by the eloquence that had distinguished them at the Bar, and who had been placed on the Bench to adjudicate cases arising out of the practical application of principles which they had themselves advocated. What they proposed was to diminish, as far as the scope of this Bill would permit, the Judiciary in a given case, not immediately, but when a vacancy occurred. They should appeal to the testimony of a Royal Commission.

MR. MELDON said, that when a country was prosperous and credit was very extended, they would find that the bankruptcy business increased, and when trade was dull, it decreased. If one of the Judges of the Court of Bankruptcy was ill or away on Circuit, they proposed that the question of filling up the appointment should be left to a Select Committee.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, the Joint Commission appointed to consider the subject came to the conclusion that the Judicial Bench in Ireland was not overmanned. He believed the Judges in England were overworked, the consequence being that men died off the Bench in this country much sooner than they did in Ireland. Again, the English Judges were assisted by Queen's Counsel at the Assizes; whereas in Ireland all the judicial duties were discharged by the Judges themselves. He protested against the imputation which had been cast upon his hon. Friend the Member for the King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien), who had sat in that House for 25 years, and was, he believed, the oldest Irish Member in the House, and was certainly free from any suggestion of dishonour in reference either to his personal, or political character. It was greatly to be regretted that hon. Members should take advantage of their position in that House to asperse others in order to get applause for themselves.

MR. BIGGAR said, that Irish Members ought not to be blamed for expressing their opinions. It was impossible for them to agree always. He was in favour of referring vacant appointments to the consideration of a Royal Commission.

MR. PARNELL wished to point out that the Amendment he had placed on the Paper seemed the only possible way of directing attention to the negligence of the Government in dealing with this Bill. The Attorney General for Ireland had alluded vaguely to some future time when he might deal with the law of Bankruptcy in Ireland, with the view, perhaps, of extending to local tribunals the jurisdiction they held in Ireland. At present the poorer class of traders were much oppressed by having to go to Dublin to get their affairs wound up. He thought this was a question which ought to have been dealt with in this Bill—that the Government, in order to simplify matters, had sought to rush through the House a Bill which was nothing more than a series of compromises between the Bar and the Judges on one hand and the Government on the other, in order to carry out this very imperfect Bill, which affirmed a vast number of abuses, and had left untouched many matters of the first consideration to the poorer classes.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, everything had been done by the Government to improve the administration of justice in Ireland. It was with the higher Courts that the present Bill dealt, and the lower Courts would come within the operation of the County Courts Bill, a subject which would no doubt receive the most careful consideration of a Select Committee. The last Bankruptcy Bill had 125 clauses and over 200 general orders. How could such matters be dealt with in one or two clauses?

MR. PARNELL said, that by the English Judicature Act the Bankruptcy Court was included.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, that it was excluded by the Act of 1875, as the provision was found not to work.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 62; Noes 230: Majority 168.—(Div. List, No. 193.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 (Existing Judge of Admiralty), agreed to.

Clause 10 (Constitution of Court of Appeal).

MR. DUNBAR moved, in page 8, line 8, after "Chief Justice," to insert "Master of the Rolls." His object was to make the Master of the Rolls a member of the Appellate Court, and thus put him in the same position as the Master of the Rolls of England. He objected to anything which would lower the office of Master of the Rolls.

MR. LAW supported the Amendment. He said he did not think the position of the Master of the Rolls in Ireland should be lowered, especially having regard to the desirability of maintaining an efficient Court of Appeal. The only objection he had ever heard to the proposal of his hon. Friend, was that the Master of the Rolls might have a difficulty in attending the Court of Appeal without causing inconvenience to the suitors in his own Court; and this, of course, it was desirable to avoid. But it was clear that unless they could have in Ireland a sufficient number of permanent Judges to constitute the Court of Appeal, they must rely on the services of ex-officio Judges. It would admittedly be necessary, on certain occasions, to draw the Chief Justices and Chief Baron from their Courts in order to form a strong Court of Appeal; and that being the case, it was plain that the larger the area from which they selected the Judges of that tribunal, the smaller would be the impediment placed in the way of the business of the Courts from which they were drawn. Then it was extremely desirable to have as great variety as possible in the constitution of the Court of Appeal, and that object would be best promoted by retaining the Master of the Rolls as an ex-officio Member of the Court. To do so would, moreover, be not only in harmony with the English system of Judicature, but also consistent with the precedence over other Judges which it was proposed still to leave to the Master of the Rolls. He hoped the Government would accept the Amendment.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he trusted that the Committee would agree to this Amendment. He thought it would be matter of regret that a Judge of the eminence of the Master of the Rolls should be left out of the Court of Appeal. His presence there would be regarded with great satisfaction in Ireland, and it would only be in conformity with the course followed in England. There was a rumour in Dublin that this step had been taken out of regard to the feelings of the Vice Chancellor; but he was sure that the Vice Chancellor was too high-minded a man to feel any jealousy at the Master of the Rolls being a Member of the Court of Appeal, although he was not himself.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT was also favourable to the Amendment. If the Master of the Rolls was not allowed to be a Member of the Court of Appeal there would be an undue preponderance in it of Common Law Judges, while the Equity element would be weak.

MR. COGAN also trusted that the Government would re-consider this point. It would strengthen the Court and be most agreeable to the Bar of Ireland that the Master of the Rolls should be a Member of the Court of Appeal.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, that no one entertained a more profound respect than he did for the present Master of the Rolls in Ireland; but the question before the Committee must be discussed on a more comprehensive basis than that involved in personal considerations. The salary of the Master of the Rolls and his high dignity were preserved. No attempt was made to detract from the precedence he had enjoyed; but this Amendment proposed to give him a jurisdiction which the Master of the Rolls had never at any time enjoyed. The ex-officio Members of the Court of Appeal were the Lord Chancellor and the Chiefs of the three Law Courts. If the Chief of the Queen's Bench, of the Exchequer, or of the Common Pleas were withdrawn from his Court to hear appeals, he would leave his own Court with three other Judges fully constituted to transact its ordinary business. But if the Master of the Rolls was withdrawn to sit in the Court of Appeal, his Court and its Chambers must be shut up. Its business could not go on, and the greatest inconvenience would be inflicted on suitors. This would be a most serious matter, seeing that the Master of the Rolls was now one of the most hard-worked Judges in Ireland, and his Court one of those most resorted to. It was said that there would be an anomaly in the Master of the Rolls remaining a Judge in the first instance, while he retained a precedence before the Judges who would sit in appeal from his decisions. But that anomaly existed now. Then he must remind the House that it was proposed to reduce the salary of future Masters of the Rolls from £4,000 to £3,500. This would be inconsistent with his presence as a member of the Court of Appeal. He did not think that it was a sufficient argument in favour of the Amendment that the Master of the Rolls in England was a member of the Appeal Court in this country.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, he was in favour of the Amendment, as he thought that in the interests of the public, it was expedient that they should have as strong an appeal as possible. When they considered the eminence of the men who had held the office of the Master of the Rolls in Ireland for the last half-century, it was clear that the presence of the Master of the Rolls would add greater strength to the Court of Appeal. He did not think that any inconvenience would arise from the occasional absence of the Master of the Rolls from his own Court while sitting in the Court of Appeal; because during such absence his duties, whether in Court or in Chambers, could be discharged by one of the Judges from the Landed Estates Court. It was most important to maintain a similar organization of the Judicial Body in England and Ireland, and this would not be done if, while the Master of the Rolls in England was a Judge of the Court of Appeal, the Master of the Rolls in Ireland was not. He protested against the reduction of the salary of Masters of the Rolls from £4,000 to £3,500.

MR. MELDON could not join in the statement that the two Chief Justices would be better spared from their Courts than the Master of the Rolls. Much inconvenience would result from Chief Justices being withdrawn from Nisi Prius cases with a host of cases waiting for trial. He thought there ought to be a larger number of ex-officio Judges to guard against the contingency of not being able to form a Court.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, that the Master of the Rolls now ranked before the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and before the Chief Baron. If these two Judges were made Judges of the Appeal Court, and they declined to make the Master of the Rolls also a Judge of the Appeal Court, it would be a slight to the latter if these Judges could reverse his decision and he could not reverse theirs.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the opinion had been expressed on both sides of the House, and by hon. Gentlemen exceedingly competent to speak on the subject, that by the arrangement which was proposed in the Bill something in the nature of a slight would be cast upon the Master of the Rolls. Nothing could have been further from the intention of the Government than to cast any slight upon a person of such high rank and position as the Master of the Rolls; and having regard to the opinion expressed, not only by hon. Gentlemen from Ireland, but by so high an authority as the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken, the Government had come to the conclusion that it would be better to accept the Amendment, so that the Master of the Rolls in Ireland should be put upon the Court of Appeal, in the same way as the Master of the Rolls in England.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. PARNELL then proposed that only one ordinary Judge should be appointed on the Court of Appeal, instead of two Judges, as provided by the clause. He observed that if there was any contention that the Irish Judges were unable to perform their work, he could understand such a proposal; but he held in his hand a comparison of the relative amount of judicial work performed in Ireland and England from 1862 to 1873. They had in Ireland 12 Judges, and if they were to distribute the same amount of work among the English Judges, it would give employment to 50. If they were to double the number of Judges in Ireland, instead of halving them, he did not think their taxation would be increased. The charge would fall upon the Consolidated Fund, for the English Government were drawing every farthing of taxation out of the country, and it would be perfectly impossible to get any more. The question was, whether an engine of bribery and corruption was to be maintained. He knew the Bar of Ireland, and he knew it was perfectly impossible for any Profession to withstand the corrupting influences that had been brought against the Bar of Ireland. They were, therefore, doing a service to that Bar, as well as to the people of Ireland, in pressing such an Amendment as this.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 5, to leave out the word "two," in order to insert the word "one."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. COGAN desired to protest in the strongest terms that the Rules of the House would permit against the statement of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), that judicial appointments in Ireland were premiums given to the eminent men of the Irish Bar for corruption. He deeply regretted that any Irish Representative should have thought it part of his duty to make such an imputation on the members of the Irish Bench. The character of the Irish Judges stood too high to require any defence from him; and he therefore contented himself with protesting against the language of the hon. Member, which was deeply to be deplored.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING pointed out that the statistics quoted by the hon. Member for Meath were altogether fallacious as a test of the business done in the Courts of the two countries. He joined in the protest of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Cogan) against the attacks of hon. Members on the purity of the Bench and honour of the Bar.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) pointed out

the necessity for having a strong Court of Appeal, one which would command the confidence of the country and prevent the necessity of constant and costly appeals to the House of Lords by dissatisfied suitors. The real strain of the business of the Court would fall upon the Lord Chancellor and the two ordinary Judges of the Court of Appeal. There would always be three Judges sitting in the Court, and he could assure the Committee that the appointment of this additional Judge had not been lightly made. He would receive a salary of £4,000 a-year, and he would occupy an analogous position to that of Lord Justice Christian.

MR. BIGGAR did not believe that if the number of ordinary Judges were reduced to one the Court of Appeal could be at all considered a weak Court. With one ordinary Judge he thought the strength of the Court would be quite sufficient for all ordinary purposes, especially after the decision of the Committee in adding the Master of the Rolls to the number of ex-officio Judges. He objected to this multiplying of officers, and saw no good grounds for paying a lawyer £4,000 a-year for doing little or nothing.

MR. PARNELL thought the Government had failed to make out a case for the appointment of this extra Judge. Why could not the ex-officio Judges of the Court of Appeal do the work? If these last were to be considered merely as ornaments, it were better to strike them off altogether. If the Master of the Rolls, whose appointment had just been the occasion of an hour's use, not to say waste of time, if the appointment of the Master of the Rolls was not a real one, and if there was another Judge appointed to do the work of the ex-officio Judge, it would have been better not to have lost an hour in the last discussion. [Ironical cheers.] He reminded hon. Members that he did not take part in that discussion. It appeared to him that Irish Members, to whom he listened, represented the desire of the nation that the Master of the Rolls should be appointed on the ground that that Judge should do the work and add to the strength of the Court of Appeal. But if another Judge was to be appointed, why appoint the Master of the Rolls? The consequence would be that the work would be in a great measure left to the ordinary Judges, the ex-officio Judges would neglect the Appeal work, and not take the pains with their work which the public had a right to expect.

MR. PARNELL said, he understood the salary of this appointed ordinary Judge was to be £4,000 a-year, but he saw no provision in the clause to that effect. He asked under what portion of the clause that was enacted.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) referred the hon. Member to the words of the 10th clause, and said the Bill followed the Act of 1856, under which the salary of Lord Justice Christian was fixed at £4,000.

MR. PARNELL asked why such a high salary as £4,000 a-year should be given to an ordinary Judge in the Court of Appeal? It was double the income of barristers of the first rank, and certainly there were not five barristers at the Irish Bar receiving £3,000 a-year. In making appointments in the English Courts the rule that salaries should bear some proportion to the emoluments of the Profession was observed; but in Ireland the salary of a Judge seemed to be twice, or, in some cases, three times the amount he would earn by practising in his Profession. Further on he had upon the Paper an Amendment to reduce these salaries, and he now moved the reduction of the salaries of the ordinary Judges of Appeal to £3,500 a-year. In all probability there would be an additional charge thrown upon the Consolidated Fund by an increase in the salary paid to the Master of the Rolls. He would ask if that was not so?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, he saw no reason for a change in that respect.

MR. PARNELL observed that an Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) proposed to increase the salary of the Master of the Rolls by £500. In that he saw an additional reason for reducing the salaries of the ordinary Judges by a like amount.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the hon. Member that the Amendment was not relevant to the clause under discussion.

MR. PARNELL gave Notice of his intention to introduce the subject on Report.

Clause 13 (Tenure of office of Judges, and oaths of office).

DR. WARD (for Mr. BUTT) moved, in page 9, line 30, to add—

“No Judge of the High Court of Justice, while he continues such Judge, shall hereafter be appointed to any place of profit under the Crown.

“No Judge of the High Court of Justice, other than the Lord Chancellor, shall be or continue to be a member of any board of Commissioners, or other body exercising any public trust, and all Acts of Parliament constituting any of the Judges members of any such board of Commissioners, or other public body, shall be and the same are hereby repealed.”

He gave instances of Judges holding positions as Commissioners of Education, and in consequence subjecting themselves and their officers to a great deal of suspicion of partiality in matters in which, from their position as Commissioners, they were interested. The respect for the law was not increased by such a state of things. One of the Judges in Ireland, in addition to his salary of £3,500, received £2,000 as a Member of a most important Commission. That would tend to show that the Judges had not a sufficient amount of judicial work. It was most undesirable that administrators of the law should come into contact with public opinion upon agitated questions, and this was recognized in England and Scotland.

It being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

The House suspended its sitting at Seven of the clock.

ILLEGITIMATE INTESTATES' ESTATES (SCOTLAND).—RESOLUTION.

COLONEL ALEXANDER, in rising to call the attention of the House to the appropriation by the Treasury of the estate of the late William Paterson, and to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient for the Treasury to depart, without previous notice, from the immemorial custom of Scotland, and for the first time to appropriate

said, that in bringing this question before the House, he hoped he should not be accused of any feeling of hostility or disrespect towards the Government. Whatever other questions might be, this was no Party question, and he dared to say that the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) would have decided in this matter precisely as Her Majesty's Advisers had done. But there was a feeling abroad—he could not say how true it was—that these matters were not regulated by this or that Government, but by a body of mysterious and permanent officials, called the Treasury; and he asked the House to say that that permanent and irresponsible Body should not deviate without previous notice from the immemorial custom of Scotland in distributing the estates of intestate bastards. He acknowledged the courtesy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had put into his hands the case of the Government. Mr. Paterson, of Paterson, in the county of Ayr, died in January, 1874, intestate, leaving personal property to the amount of about £40,000. He was the illegitimate son of Mr. Paterson, of Jamaica, who adopted him and educated him as his son. The claimant, Mr. Paterson, of Montgomery, was the nephew, heir at law, and next of kin to the intestate bastard's father, and was consequently cousin-german to the intestate bastard. If the deceased had been legitimate, the claimant would have succeeded at once without question to the whole of the property, and he claimed to be placed in the same position as he would have occupied if the deceased had been legitimate. But he (Colonel Alexander) knew it might be said—and he believed it would be said, either by the Chancellor of the Exchequer or by the Secretary to the Treasury—that as the deceased bastard had the power of making a will, and failed to make a will, he consequently had no intention of benefiting his (Colonel Alexander's) constituent, Mr. Paterson, of Montgomery—that he preferred, in fact, that his property should escheat to the Crown. But, in the first place, it was very unlikely he should desire that his property should be placed in the same category as the property of felons and outlaws; and, in the next place, there was nothing whatever extraordinary in the circumstance that he failed to make a will. Many persons from deeply-rooted habits of procrastination failed to make a will. But whether he had, or had not an intention of benefiting his (Colonel Alexander's) constituent was totally beside the question. There were many owners of property between whom and their heirs at law no love was lost; but if those owners died intestate, the law said that their heirs at law should inherit the property. As the deceased bastard failed to make a will, he (Colonel Alexander) submitted the law assumed his intention was that his property should go to his heir at law. He (Colonel Alexander) contended that the heir at law of an intestate bastard should not be placed in a worse position than the heir at law of a person born in wedlock. He might be asked why, when Parliament gave to the bastard the power to make a will, it did not go further, and give the succession, as a matter of course, to the next of kin of an intestate bastard? His answer was, that it was often difficult to ascertain who were the next of kin; but he submitted that when once the claim of next of kin had been ascertained to be genuine, the Treasury had always proceeded on one fixed and settled and unchangeable principle in distributing these estates. As authority for this, he would quote the Secretary to the Treasury, who, early in this Session, replying to a Question by the hon. Member for Greenock (Mr. Grieve) said—

"The Treasury, in considering first of all the claim of any individual, inquired whether there was any evidence, either by an informal will or otherwise, of an intention to make provision for that individual. Then they considered further whether a strong claim existed on the part of individuals with regard to whom there was no such evidence. Then they proceeded to consider what would have been the disposal of the property supposing the deceased had been legitimate, and they followed the principles laid down by the law for the distribution of property in the case of legitimate persons who died intestate."—[3 Hansard, ccxxxii. 896.]

Although the deceased bastard had been dead upwards of three years, no instrument indicating his desire to leave his property in any particular manner had been discovered. The deceased had left several poor relatives on the mother's side who had made claims upon the property; but he believed that the Secretary to the Treasury had properly decided, that as those persons would have had no right to it had the deceased been legitimate, they could derive no right from the fact that he was illegitimate. In these circumstances, the hon. Gentleman could only follow the course indicated by himself—namely, to follow the principles laid down by the law of Scotland for the distribution of property in the case of illegitimate persons who died intestate. He submitted that that was the course which had been invariably followed by the hon. Member and his Predecessors in similar cases. In replying to a later Question by the hon. Member for Greenock, the Secretary to the Treasury said—

"I am not aware of any case in Scotland in which the Treasury appropriated and retained the estate of an intestate bastard when there existed either a written statement of his intentions regarding the disposal of his estate after his death, or persons who, had he been legitimate, would have been his blood relations."—[Ibid. 1257.]

He had been informed in the Lobby that the hon. Member had a complete answer to the case; but if so, he must have a complete answer to his own statements. He asked why this immemorial custom and practice was to be departed from in this particular instance? The property of deceased intestate bastards was administered in Scotland, in the first place, by the old Scotch Lords of the Treasury, then by the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, and now, since 1833, by the Lords of the Treasury. But although the administrators had changed, the principles upon which the administration had proceeded still remained in force. The hon. Member's statement of the practice was corroborated by Sir Samuel Shepherd, the Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer in Scotland from 1819 to 1830, who was examined before a Committee of the House of Commons in 1832, and he said, as to the practice of that Court—

"Another branch of the Court of Exchequer was that of disposing for the Crown of property which came to the Crown as the ultimus hæres, or by escheat, as in the case of bastards. The practice of the Court was to give it to those persons who would have been entitled to it had not illegitimacy intervened, reserving also some portion for beneficial purposes."

Sir Samuel Shepherd went on to say that the portion which was reserved for beneficial purposes was about what the amount of duty would have been that the person succeeding, according to his affinity, would have had to pay to the Crown; so that the principles were so fixed, that there was a separate branch of the Court for such cases, and the reservation for beneficial purposes strengthened his position; for by that arrangement the heirs of intestate bastards were prevented from obtaining an exemption from succession duty not enjoyed by the heirs of persons born in wedlock. Could there be a better proof that the practice of the Court was settled, and not intermittent, occasional, and spasmodic? Sir Samuel Shepherd was next asked, if he would not ask whether the party was domiciled in Scotland, and he replied—

“Most certainly. In all these cases we adhere to the law of Scotland, except, in some cases in which we deviate a little from charitable motives; but, generally speaking, that is the law upon which we distribute all the property.”

In a letter to The Echo by Mr. Preston, proprietor of Chambers' Index to Next of Kin, the evidence of Mr. Hart Dyke, late Queen's Proctor, was quoted. He would quote from the official Report. Mr. Hart Dyke said—

“I take out letters of administration, and get in all money for the Government in connection with the estates of intestate bastards. When bastards die there are always plenty of people only too ready to seize hold of their property. In ordinary cases I receive a letter stating that A. B. is dead, and that he had such and such property, that he was a bastard, or had none but illegitimate relatives. I find out who the next of kin are, or the persons to whom the Crown should make grants, and I recommend accordingly.”

English cases were, he understood, relied on; but this evidence, he thought, showed that, after all, the practice in England was not very different from the immemorial practice of Scotland in such cases. But whether it was so, or not, was not the question. This was Scotch property, and they were not bound by English, but by Scotch law and custom. They had no more to do with the law of England in this case than with the law of France or Germany. Professor Bell, a recognized authority on this point, said it was a well-recognized principle in the law of all countries, that the succession in movables was regulated by the domicile at the time of death. But the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury might say that they were not dealing with law, but with custom.

Colonel Alexander

He would appeal to any hon. and learned Gentleman in that House, whether custom which had subsisted for a number of years had not the full force of law? Parliament had itself expressly sanctioned the principle which guided the Courts of Scotland in the distribution of the property of intestate bastards in the Savings Bank Act. That Act expressly provided that if any depositor in any such savings bank, being illegitimate, should die intestate, leaving any person or persons who, but for the illegitimacy of such depositor, would be entitled to the money due to such deceased depositor, it should be lawful for the trustees to pay the money due to such deceased depositor to any one or more of such persons as, in their opinion, would have been entitled to the same had the depositor been legitimate. The right hon. Gentleman might quote this section against him, and say that Parliament probably intended to grant the depositors in savings banks a special privilege. But, he asked, what was the distinction between the two descriptions of property? Why should Government grant one and withhold the other? The right hon. Gentleman was, he apprehended, afraid of the existing law. He might, however, re-assure him by stating that, although the intestate bastard died three and a-half years ago, and diligent search had been made amongst his papers for a will, no such document had been found. Moreover, Mr. Paterson, of Montgomery, was quite willing to give the most ample security for the reimbursement of the money in the improbable event of a will turning up. He was even willing that the money should be placed in the hands of trustees to be named by the Government. He submitted that it was the duty of the Government, after a reasonable time had elapsed, to distribute this estate according to the immemorial custom of the country of the deceased person. There was one other point which the right hon. Gentleman would make, which was this—He would say that Mr. Paterson, of Jamaica, had directed that his property, failing issue of the body of the bastard, was to go to a cousin, the heir of entail, and that that proved that his daughter, the mother of his constituent, was sufficiently provided for. No doubt, that was so, as far as the entailed property was concerned; but surely the right hon.

Gentleman did not mean to contend that the savings of the deceased bastard, over which Mr. Paterson, of Jamaica, could possibly have no control, could be bequeathed by the latter to anyone whatever. He submitted that what the House had to consider, was not what were the intentions of Mr. Paterson, of Jamaica, but of Mr. Paterson, the deceased bastard. He thanked the House for the patience with which it had listened to him. He earnestly asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to re-consider the decision at which he had arrived, so that it might not go forth to the country that the policy of a Conservative Government was a policy of spoliation and confiscation.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON seconded the Motion, and said, he thought the hon. and gallant Member had laid before the House a case of great hardship, not only in the nature of the case itself, but enhanced by the departure of the Government from their usual action in cases of a similar nature. The state of the law with regard to natural offspring was very unsatisfactory. It was hard and unjust, punishing the innocent for the sins of the guilty—natural offspring were disinherited by our law on the ground of a legal fiction which said that they had no father, while it compelled the putative father to support his illegitimate child—such was the inconsistency of the law. He hoped that this case would be the means of bringing the Government to a sense of this great wrong, and that they might think it right to amend the law for the protection of innocent persons born out of wedlock. Such an alteration of the law might be made without injury to the sacred relations of married life.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient for the Treasury to depart, without previous notice, from the immemorial custom of Scotland, and for the first time to appropriate the estate of an intestate bastard when there are blood relations who, if he had been legitimate, would have been his next of kin according to the Law of Scotland.”—(Colonel Alexander.)

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Alexander) had laid a very serious indictment against the Treasury, and he thought particularly against the Secretary to the Treasury, in relation to the matter which he had brought before the House. He confessed that he was undertaking an unpleasant duty, and one of serious responsibility. To a person in his position, it would be infinitely more pleasant in dealing with a large fund for which he was not responsible to Parliament, to distribute it among claimants whose view was that their claims were satisfactorily established, than to deal with it otherwise. But he stood in the position of a trustee, and was responsible for the due administration of the fund which the law placed in his hands. The law gave the estates of intestate bastards to the State. That property was constituted by the law as much the property of the State as were the funds voted by Parliament for the service of the Crown. Custom, however, had said that when an intestate bastard had expressed a strong feeling in favour of a particular individual to whom he was attached, or in favour of persons who had rendered great services to him, his wishes should be respected, and that the State should at its discretion make a grant or gift to those individuals. Now, what was their duty in the particular case under consideration? It was their duty to administer the property agreeably to the trust reposed in them. They were responsible to their own consciences, as well as to Parliament, and they had no right to distribute such funds with liberality and generosity as they might do if they were dealing with their own. They had simply to consider what was right, and to do justice, and it was their duty to examine, as far as they were able, into the circumstances of the deceased, into his intentions and wishes. With regard to the origin of the property in question, the Treasury found that a Mr. Paterson, of Jamaica, who had acquired a large fortune, had a sister and an illegitimate son. To his sister and her children he left half his property; to his illegitimate son he left the other half, placing it in trust for his benefit, but carefully providing that if the bastard should die without heirs, the property should not go to the sister nor to the heir at law, but to a distant cousin of his own. Rightly or wrongly, the Treasury took that to be, as they believed it was, the expression of the wish and will of the individual who was the founder of the family. Well, the illegitimate son came to Scotland and lived a secluded life; he saved money, but was, and remained, on terms very far from friendly with the relatives of his father. He sought to conceal the property he possessed. Only that morning a letter had been received from Messrs. Andrews, his agents, stating that for 20 years they had invested in their own names, without accounting to him, a large proportion of the fund which was now claimed. At the time of his death they said they had a sum of £28,194 standing in their names in the Bank, and that the object with which this arrangement was made was to conceal the fact that the property in question was his. With that view he only received £50 half-yearly, and that not because he wanted money, for he had £10,000 in the Bank of Scotland, and a considerable sum in hand, but because he had no friendship for the relations of his father, and, on the contrary, an antipathy to them. The strong presumption, his agent added, was therefore, that he did not desire that his property should go amongst them. In fact, if it were not for the honesty of his agents, it would have been impossible for persons who now claimed to have known that the sum they claimed was the accumulation of the savings of the deceased. But, again, they had received notice that it was very probable the deceased had made a will, though the will had not yet been discovered. ["Oh!"] Well, in another case a will had turned up, and the principal sum was claimed after 50 years, together with 4 per cent interest. His hon. and gallant Friend had laid stress on the answers he had given on this subject in Parliament; but what he had said was said from a sense of responsibility, and what he had done was done under the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown. If the Treasury had been made aware of any intention whatever on the part of the deceased to benefit any particular person, it would have been their wish to give full effect to that intention, but they had no such evidence. The Treasury found that the deceased had the reverse of any intention to benefit his relations on the father's side; and, as trustees for the State and guardians of the public purse, the Treasury did not consider it their duty to make free with large grants of the sum at their disposal. Stress had been laid on the fact that the custom of Scotland on the subject had been constant and unvarying; but that assertion was not borne out by the facts of the case. Every case had been dealt with according to its circumstances, and it was not possible to deal with them cases in any other way. Again, it had been said that the Treasury treated applicants harshly; but the Treasury had a duty imposed upon them, and whether it was right or wrong, morally—and he thought it morally right that for the benefit of the State things should be as they now were—they had to administer the law. It was not for them to decide whether the policy of the law was right or wrong; but if they exercised a large and generous discretion in giving away the funds of the State they would be accountable, not only to Parliament, but to their own conscience. There was no Department of the Government more responsible than that of the Treasury. They were called to account if they proposed Votes to Parliament which, after careful scrutiny, they deemed to be necessary; they were called to account if they failed to recognize the claims of individuals who complained that they were not treated with due liberality. If it became their duty to tell Parliament that Ways and Means could not be found, they were liable to be accused of want of economy and watchfulness. The duty of acting at the Treasury was in other respects far from being enviable and agreeable. It might be very easy to say "Yes" to the repeated applications that were made to the Treasury; but great pressure was brought to bear upon them by constituents, members of the Press, and the public; and they were urged to do their duty to the State, resisting claims and charges which ought not properly to be imposed upon them. In the present case various claims had been made. The solicitors—the Messrs. Andrews—believed that the deceased intended to give them the sum left in their custody—namely, £28,000—and if the deceased trusted them with this large sum for 20 years without exacting any accounts from them, any claim for consideration made from that quarter must, no doubt, be considered. There were 17 cousins, on whose behalf claims had been advanced, and there were four other classes of Petitioners who thought that the money should be given to public objects in

Mr. W. H. Smith

Kilmarnock. The minister of the High Church at Kilmarnock confirmed the statement that the deceased entertained an antipathy against his relations, and he inferred that the deceased, probably, intended to leave him a legacy: it would clearly, therefore, be very difficult to get any evidence as to the wishes and intentions of the deceased. The law, however, gave this property to the State, leaving a discretion to the Treasury as to its distribution, which was a matter of prescription, and not of law. The relations, whose claims were the subject of the Motion now before the House, had already been provided for to the extent of one-half the original property, and there was no evidence that they were on amicable terms with the deceased, or that he intended to benefit them by his will, but the contrary. Was it the wish and intention of Parliament that the Secretary to the Treasury should be accessible to all the influences which were brought to bear in cases of the kind, and so to make a large distribution of the funds which the law gave to him to administer, not for his own benefit, but for the benefit of the State? If so, then Parliament ought not to require the discussion of Votes of money at all, and Ministers should be allowed at their discretion to give away the money of the State as they might think fit in obedience to the strong pressure that might be brought to bear upon them in particular cases. Let Parliament alter the law if it pleased; but if the law gave this property to the State, it was not right that the Secretary to the Treasury should be squeezed and pressed to distribute this money in the manner most agreeable at the moment to the feelings of Members of that House.

Mr. ANDERSON, while admitting the responsibility which Parliament imposed upon the Treasury, and that the Treasury were in duty bound to look after all sources of revenue, and admitting, at the same time, that this was a matter of prescription rather than of legal right, wished to point out at the same time that this prescription had, from long use and wont, all the force of law, and he thought it was not too much to ask the Government not to depart from the usage which in these cases had been immemorial. The Secretary to the Treasury had said that the law gave the property in question to assist the revenues of the State; but property so acquired would never assist the revenues of the State, and would never do any good to the State. It was property which, got in such a way, ought to, and would, carry a curse with it, for it was very little short of plunder to deal with it so. The only point in the speech of the Secretary to the Treasury which required a reply was that which arose on the letter of the Messrs. Andrews, where it was said that the bastard was on unfriendly terms with Paterson. He (Mr. Anderson) was authorized to contradict that assertion; on the contrary, he continued to visit Paterson as long as he visited any one. The Andrews family were themselves making a claim to the property, and it was to their interest to make out that the man was on unfriendly terms with his relatives; but the statement was absolutely without foundation, and the alleged antipathy did not exist. As for the part of the estate that was otherwise settled it was an entailed estate, and therefore its settlement did not touch the point at issue. It was important that the House should come to a vote upon this question. He trusted the Government would give way to the general feeling of the Scotch Members in the matter. It was a question on which Scotch Members intended to vote "solid"—both sides of the House would vote together.

Mr. DODSON implored hon. Members not to come to a hasty decision upon this question, which was one of very great importance, extending far beyond the case immediately before the House. It involved a question of law and of practice in dealing with property of this nature. He described a case which came under his notice, when he held office at the Treasury. A man of high birth and large property had a legitimate daughter, a legitimate son, and an illegitimate one, and the latter, having received a commercial education, became the partner of a wealthy tradesman, who bequeathed him his property. He willed it to his only friend, his mother, who died a few days before him, and there being no one to take the property, the legitimate son and the children of the legitimate daughter claimed it as being next of kin. The Treasury refused to accede to that claim. What would have been the effect of their conceding it? It would have been a reward to them because their father had begotten the bastard. [Laughter.] Hon. Members laughed; but that was really a case which came before him a few years ago. Surely there was a confusion of ideas when people spoke as they did of the moral claim of the nearest of kin of a bastard. The principle underlying the distribution of the property of an intestate to his nearest of kin was that the State looked upon them as having presumably been his best friends, his supporters and companions in life. But this was not a presumption which held good in the case of a bastard. He had been probably ignored and rejected as an outcast by those who would, in a case of legitimacy, be presumably entitled to his property. The Treasury acted upon the principle of looking first of all to see if there was any written declaration, however informal, of the wishes and intentions of the intestate bastard, and if there was they were always disposed liberally to give way to that. They also looked about to see if he had any relations on the mother's side, any particular friends who had assisted him, who were those who throughout life had been his neighbours in the scriptural sense of the term. If there were any cases of that kind the Treasury was always disposed to consider them. There was always the difficulty that the nearest of kin in blood could not be assumed to be the persons to whom the intestate person was most attached. In deciding this question the House must not only look at the particular case before it, but at the general principles. No one who knew the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would accuse them of dealing hardly or unjustly with any case brought before them. He felt it his duty to support those who had charge of the administration of these estates, and he should unhesitatingly give his vote with the Government upon this question.

MR. COLMAN fully admitted that this was a broad question, and that it must not be decided by isolated cases; but he thought the House ought to know that there had been cases in which the relatives of the putative father had received allowances and the relatives on the mother's side had not been allowed at all.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, this was a very difficult case, and one which most of them must wish to avoid giving judgment upon. Before he gave his vote or abstained from voting, he wished to ask one question. He understood by the terms of the Notice that this was the first time that the estate of an intestate bastard in Scotland had not been given to the next of kin. The Secretary of the Treasury in his reply had not met that particular point, and he should be glad to hear from the Solicitor General whether there was any precedent for not giving the estate of an intestate bastard to the next of kin. If there was not, he confessed he should feel strongly inclined to vote for the Motion.

DR. LUSH observed that the way in which he should vote would be determined by the answer given to the question—was there any reciprocity in the matter? If the legitimate relations of a bastard had a right to claim the result of his savings there should, in his opinion, be the alternative that the bastard children should have the same rights as the legitimate in the distribution of property.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY maintained that until this case arose it had been the universal practice of the Exchequer of Scotland to allow the property of the intestate bastard to go to those who would have been his next of kin had he been legitimate. He should like to know what the Government really meant to do with this money; did they mean to keep it altogether or distribute it among the relatives of the deceased, or were they going to wait until a will turned up? Their answer to these queries would decide the vote he should give.

DR. KENEALY said, he had listened to this debate with considerable pain and sorrow, because instead of this question having been argued in that House on grand and equitable principles, the meanest and most contemptible Nisi Prius views had been brought to bear upon it. He hoped the Leader of the British House of Commons would instruct his followers to look upon the matter in the light Pitt would have done, who would have been ashamed to pocket money derived from such a source. He defied anyone to produce an instance where the immemorial custom of Scotland had been departed from as it had been departed from now. He dissented from the view which had been put forward, that this was simply a question of law, for he agreed with those who held that prescription had overridden law, and the House ought on that occasion to pass a vote which would give prescription the force of law, and do an act of justice, rather than allow the Government to retain possession of money to which they were not entitled. He considered that the fact of the deceased not having made a will showed that he believed his property would go, according to custom, to his sister and her children. He did not believe there was any will in existence. He sincerely hoped from the essence of his heart—[Laughter—he supposed it was allowed in Parliament to speak of the essence of one's heart—that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would succeed in carrying this Resolution.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL, as an English lawyer, would venture to put before the House some circumstances which he thought would justify them in rejecting the Motion before the House. He should have concurred in much of what had been stated on both sides if the statement of the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Alexander) could be substantiated by facts. If it had really been the immemorial custom in Scotland that property of this kind had always been treated in the way in which it was suggested that the property in this case should be treated, then he agreed that the course taken by the Treasury was an extreme one, and one not likely to find favour with the House. But that was exactly, he thought, where the hon. and gallant Gentleman had failed. That was not, and never had been, the custom in the history of Scotland. Escheats by bastardy, like every other escheat, belonged originally to the superior feudal lord. About the 16th century the Crown succeeded to those escheats. In 1707, in pursuance of the Articles of Union, an Exchequer Court was established in Scotland, in the two-fold character of a Court of Law, and also as a Board, administering Treasury funds very much as they were now administered by the Lords of the Treasury; and down to 1829, or even a later period, the Court of Exchequer in Scotland did exactly what the Treasury claimed to do now. In the cases of small estates, and when it could be done without injury to the revenue or the Crown, the property might be distributed rather in the way of charity, if it was not thought desirable to insist on the extreme rights of the Crown. A Committee sat in 1832 to consider the propriety of abolishing the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, and distributing its duties differently; and the result was that from 1832 to 1835 the distribution of these estates was given to the Woods and Forests, and after that time it was entrusted to the Lords of the Treasury. Chief Baron Abercrombie, who was examined before that Committee, described the principle on which the property of intestate bastards was distributed by the Court. He stated that the property was disposed of in the same way as property of that kind was distributed by the Treasury in England—that they always reserved a portion as a charitable fund, and generally distributed the remainder among those persons who appeared to have been most attentive to, and most in the confidence of, the deceased. He believed that to be the practice at this hour, and that the Treasury in England acted on that principle—the principle of an absolute discretion, remembering that they were trustees of the real heir, should one ever turn up. In the year 1730 a book on the subject was compiled, and was printed in 1820 under the superintendence of two Barons of the Exchequer, and it described the practice which had prevailed in the distribution of these estates as that which had been stated in the evidence of the Chief Baron. Sir Henry Jardine, who was examined before the same Committee, concurred in the evidence which had been given by the Chief Baron, and it appeared that a discretionary power had always been given to the Baron. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER inquired if that was an English or Scotch precedent?] It was purely a Scotch precedent, and it was clear that the practice which began in 1707 was carried down to the time at which the work to which he had referred was published. He thought the Motion now before the House was inconsistent with the principle that an immemorial practice existed that the estate should be administered according to the same principle that it would have been if the deceased person had died intestate. This matter, however, involved far wider considerations than were involved merely in the discussion of the particular case before the House. The policy of the law was to encourage marriage, and to refuse to acknowledge illegitimacy; and it would be most injurious to lay down a general proposition to the effect that the property of a bastard intestate should be treated in the same way as if he had been properly married, and his issue had been born in wedlock. As far as the particular case before the House was concerned, he could only say that the duty of the Law Officers was to give to the Crown the best advice in their power in view of the facts presented to them. With reference to the discretionary power which was in certain cases exercised by the Crown, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Forster) had asked him whether he could point to any instance in which the Crown had taken to itself the whole property of an intestate bastard. He confessed that he was unable to adduce any such instance. On the other hand, he thought the right hon. Gentleman would feel the relevancy of this observation—that the instances in which any question of this sort had arisen during the time within which the discretionary power of the Commissioners had been exercised had been very rare indeed. But, no doubt, the discretionary power of the Crown had been exercised in such cases whenever they had occurred, as in cases of unclaimed dividends or treasure trove; and he could see no difference between these cases, except so far as the technical law of bastardy operated. For this reason, and also because he knew how beneficially the discretion of the Crown had been used, he could not wish to see it taken away.

MR. M'LAREN said, it was clear that before this case there had not been a case of this sort in which such a large sum of money had not been divided amongst the friends of the deceased. He wished to point out that the feeling throughout Scotland was that the money ought to be given to those friends; and therefore the House ought to confirm the Resolution and not allow the Government to rob those friends of £40,000. A comparison of legal opinion must be in favour of Sir Samuel Shepherd, whose views were opposed to that of a late Speaker (Mr. Abercromby), and he could not believe that any Lord Advocate could think otherwise.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the absence of the Lord Advocate, to whom the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) had referred, was due to indisposition, and that though the law on the subject had been sufficiently stated, the Government was somewhat at a disadvantage. However, the Lord Advocate would in all probability have corroborated the statement the House had just heard. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) could only say that this was one of those questions which caused a good deal of anxiety to the Treasury. This question had been considered by his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury and himself. They had given it their best attention, and they had had before them the opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown. The equity of the case, as well as the law, had been well considered, and he believed that neither the House nor the Government could agree to the proposition which they had been asked to affirm—namely, that it had been the immemorial usage to appropriate the estate of an intestate bastard to those who would have been his natural heirs. He denied altogether that there had been any such immemorial usage. The immemorial usage had been the other way. There could be no doubt, in the first place, as to the law that, when the bastard died intestate, his estate escheated to the Crown. In olden times when it escheated to the feudal lord he took it as a part of his profits. When the Crown deprived the feudal lord of that privilege it took the estate as part of the Crown revenues; and when in a later day a milder system was introduced, that system was not founded on the rights of the case, but on the discretion and, so to speak, the charity of the Crown. A proof of it was that the Crown always mentioned that a portion of the estate was given in charity, which showed that there was no immemorial usage to give it to the next of kin. Then it must be borne in mind that in former times there was greater reason for exercising more charity in the case of a bastard in Scotland than in England, because a bastard in Scotland was subject to peculiar disadvantages not applicable in England. Even if he had children of his own, he was unable to make a will in their favour until 1836. Therefore, there was the more reason that the Crown, when it became possessed of the bastard's property, should in charity make over to his children that which had come to the State. The Legislature took the circumstances into consideration, and removed the difficulty by giving the bastard power to make provision for his family and friends by making a will. But the Legislature did not think it right to go beyond that; it left the case of the intestate bastard in the same position as before. From that it might be gathered that the Legislature left the estate of the intestate bastard to be disposed of at the discretion of the Crown. It was perfectly well known to Mr. Paterson that such was the law. He could at any moment make a will, and he must have known that if he did not his property would come into the hands of the State, and might be disposed of in any way at the pleasure of the State. There was no evidence that Mr. Paterson had any desire to leave his estate to any particular person. The Government were asked whether they knew of any case in which property to any considerable amount had been left undisposed of by a bastard. They knew of no case in point; but did the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) know of any which would support his view? What was the argument drawn from immemorial usage? It was that some expectations had probably been entertained by the relatives of the bastard which had been disappointed. If that were the case with his own children or some one whom he had encouraged to hope, it would be hard to disappoint them. But there was not a scintilla of evidence that there were any such expectations. Under these circumstances, he could only appeal to the House to consider this case fairly and upon its merits. It was natural that everyone should desire to benefit an individual in such a case rather than the State. But let the House consider what the position of the State and the Treasury was. Let them bear in mind that the exercise of discretion in this matter was a duty which was imposed on the State and the Treasury, and which was exercised under a strong sense of responsibility to the public; and let the House rest assured that in the decision of this case they had been actuated by the most thoroughly public-spirited motives.

Question put.

CHURCH PATRONAGE.—RESOLUTION.

MR. LEATHAM, in rising to call attention to the traffic in livings; and to move—

said:—Mr. Speaker, Perhaps, Sir, it may excite surprise that any one who is known to be opposed to the principle of an Established Church, should trouble himself about reforms, the introduction of which is often regarded as the better alternative of disestablishment; a very common notion, perhaps, being that we should prefer to see scandals and abuses as rife and rampant in the Church as possible, in order that public disapprobation may be the more vehemently excited against an institution in which such scandals exist. But I venture to think that those who judge our motives have scarcely done justice to them, and certainly they have not penetrated our policy. No doubt we desire to see disestablishment, but we desire to approach it, not solely or chiefly, through external agency, but by producing what we conceive to be a healthier condition and tone of feeling inside the Church. Now these great reforms are either possible, or they are not possible. Either event must, in my humble judgment, advance our views. If it be found that they are impossible—if, with every disposition to introduce them on the part of Parliament and of the Church, these abuses are found to be so built into the system that they cannot be removed without bringing down the whole fabric, what an argument such a discovery will leave in our hands. If, on the other hand, it be found possible to introduce them, just in proportion as you succeed in doing so, will you cause the Church to assimilate to the free Churches around her, and will you weaken and lower the barriers which still separate her from a state of entire freedom.

Now, Sir, it cannot be said, that in bringing forward this Motion I have shown any of the impatience of a fanatic. I have waited until the reforming zeal of the whole Bench of Bishops has evaporated, and until it is evident to the comprehension of everybody that if these reforms are to be introduced at all, the initiative must be taken by those who, if not so jealous of the honour of the Church, are, at least, a little more hopeful as to the possibility of vindicating it. Nor, Sir, because this is the Motion of an outsider, is that any reason why those who sympathize with its object inside the Church should hesitate to support it, and, in fact, accept the challenge which I now make to them, and take it off my hands; especially as I shall content myself with laying bare the extent of the evil, and shall leave it to those who have the right to prescribe, to indicate the nature of the remedy. This is not because I have arrived at no conclusions of my own, but because the loud professions of the recognized physicians of the Church demand that the prescription should not come from one who belongs to quite another faculty. And I have other reasons. If I were to state what I think ought to be done with the proper attention to detail, I must make a much larger demand upon the indulgence of the House than I have any right at this hour to expect; indeed, it may fairly be doubted whether, when this question has once passed out of the present stage—which I take to be purely preliminary—it ought to remain for an hour in the hands of any private Member. It is the Government alone which can deal with it effectually, and one reason why I do not propose even to sketch what I think it would be well to do, is because I am anxious not to seem by this Motion in any sense to tie the hands of Government. My desire is to draw from the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary the declaration that he is prepared, when a fitting opportunity arises, to devote to this subject some of the attention and ability which he has devoted to it already, and at the same time to draw from the House an expression of opinion which may fortify him in the resolution to deal with it more effectually than it was proposed to be dealt with by the abortive Bill of 1875.

And now, Sir, as to the extent of this traffic. Mr. Day, for seven years secretary to the Bishop of Rochester, laid before the Committee of the House of Lords a tabular statement, containing some particulars of the advowsons and next presentations which were offered for sale in the columns of The Ecclesi- astical Gazette, in the months of January, 1872, 1873, and 1874; the month of January being selected because it afforded a fair average for the rest of the year. I find from this statement that in January, 1872, 88 livings were then offered; in January, 1873, 89; and in January, 1874, 108. But do not let the House imagine that this monthly exhibition of spiritual bargains gives any adequate notion of the number of livings actually in the hands of agents. A friend of mine, who is well known to several Members of this House, who has made a special study of this question, and, under the nom de plume "Promotion by Merit," contributed a series of extremely able letters to a prominent member of the provincial Press (The Manchester Examiner), calculated three or four years ago, from a careful comparison of the printed registers of Church preferment, that at that time nearly one-fifth of the whole saleable patronage of the Church was up in the market for sale or for exchange, and that if all the advertizing agents were as successful in the transaction of business as one of them, Mr. Emery Stark, was recently shown to have been, the whole Church might be turned over, in a commercial sense, in 13 years. Now I have had the opportunity of verifying this gentleman's statements. Through the kindness of friends I have made quite a collection of recent issues of these periodically-printed registers. I find that eight agents who advertize in The Ecclesiastical Gazette give particulars, either in the advertizements themselves, or in the registers which they advertize in the same journal, of 1,676 livings selected from their books, and that if we add to these the number of benefices which one of these agents informs us that he has upon his register at home, we arrive at the enormous number of 2,383 as that of the livings offered for sale or exchange through recognized agents. The agent to whom I have just referred states that—

"Advertisements are little resorted to; they are open to great objection, and it is an established rule of the office to abstain from them as much as possible."

So he prefaces a list of 193 benefices or next presentations for sale, by the intimation that he has upwards of 1,000 on his books. He also informs us that—

"It was held by a very eminent Prelate, lately deceased; that you might just as well call the buying and selling of a vacant living magic, as call it after the folly of Simon Magus."

Now, perhaps, it may be said that the eagerness to get rid of this kind of property is such that patrons often employ more than one agent; so that these lists contain duplicate advertizements. But I may observe that in the numbers which I have given I have not included—except in the case of one agent—what are termed "private instructions." These are only shown to purchasers who have their hands already in their pockets, or who wish to give to this species of profligacy all the piquancy of an assignation in the dark. One agent alone informs us that he has 60 of these private instructions on his books; and another, who only advertizes particulars of four livings, states that he has preferment on hand in almost every county in England. We may fairly, then, assume that at least 2,000 livings, or nearly one-fourth of the whole saleable patronage of the Church, is in the market for sale or exchange. Now, it has been asserted that some of these are bogus advertizements. My friend, to whom I have already alluded, has tapped these lists all over to test them, and he has not discovered a single bogus advertizement. The other day, for a moment, it seemed that he had done so. Having identified one of the livings, he wrote to The Manchester Examiner, stating that the Rev. J. Ray, both patron and incumbent, was offering by private treaty his living of Ashton-upon-Mersey, with immediate possession. Immediately there was immense indignation among this gentleman's friends at Ashton. A correspondence ensued, as it seemed to me, little creditable to those who took part in it. Its object appeared to be to lead the public astray, for it turned out that the utmost the rev. gentleman could say, after a hasty visit to London, the object of which could only be surmised, was that "the living was not now on sale."

Now, Sir, let us look at these advertizements to see whether there is anything in them to indicate the spirit in which this traffic is carried on. Is there anything, for example, to indicate that the responsibilities which are thus changing hands for money are some of the most solemn which any man can undertake? Or is the whole phraseology that of the merest and coarsest speculation? Sir, ever since I can remember, and long before, there has been more or less of controversy in the Church with regard to disputed points of dogma and ritual. What traces has that controversy left on these lists? Mr. Cox, of Belper, whose name is well known in connection with his candidature for Parliamentary honours, has collected and analyzed 400 of these advertizements. In 14 only did he find any mention of what are technically termed views. In four a High Church incumbent would be preferred; in 10 a Low Church incumbent. One patron has a soul above all such considerations. "High Church," he says, "but Evangelical, would do for this parish." In 107 out of the 400 there is mention of "good society;" in some it is described as "very choice," in others as "real county;" in one there can be no doubt about it, for we are told that "there are five gentlemen's residences in this parish," and that in one of them is to be found a live Baronet, and in another an actual Admiral. Another parish is eligible for a double reason, "good society and no squire." In 53 the scenery is extolled. The clergy would seem to be curious about stabling. In five there is stabling for five horses, in four for six, in one for seven, and in one for eight. Ample justice is done to the sporting propensities of our spiritual guides. Fishing has always been an apostolical pursuit. In 30 we have good "fishing," in nine "shooting," in six "hunting;" while in three the successor of the Apostle has to be content with such modest excitement as is to be found in the use of the pea rifle. They have only rookeries to offer. But the baits which are evidently the most to be relied upon are those which suggest a very limited sphere of usefulness, or very early possession. Thus, "population under 100, duty nominal;" "almost a sinecure, single service and no school;" "no cure of souls, incumbent 77 and non-resident;" "population 1,740, duty only on every alternate Sunday," but "stabling for five horses and income £800;" "incumbent about 80, in a very precarious state of health;" "annual value £1,800, incumbent" (the advertizer) "aged 58, but he is, it is believed, in a very bad state of health." A friend of mine received the other day an advertizement of a living for sale, accompanied by a memorandum which informed him that if he wished to buy he must reply by return, "as the incumbent was dying." He delayed doing so for a few days, and he was then informed that the incumbent was dead. "Immediate possession" is constantly advertized. I have a Monthly Register of Church Preferment for Sale, published by Mr. Bagster, for February last, which contains 94 advertizements, and in 57 of these immediate possession is guaranteed. Well, but, Sir, this great business is not always confined to retail. It sometimes assumes wholesale proportions, and livings are sold by the bunch. The cases of Stockport and Sandbach have been brought to my notice. Stockport was purchased by Mr. Symonds, a calico-printer at Manchester, 17 or 18 years ago, it having been offered by auction at the Warren Bulkeley Arms, along with 24 public-houses, two beer-houses, and a brewery. The incumbent was then 71 years old, but it was 17 years before this bargain fell in, although when it did, Mr. Symonds had no reason to complain, for it carried with it the patronage of six other parishes. But, not content with that, Mr. Symonds, the present incumbent, is endeavouring to upset the leases granted by his predecessor. Sandbach was purchased by a gentleman named Armistead, who put in his son in 1828. The son immediately instituted a suit for vicarial tithes against his parishioners, and so raised his annual income from £200 to £1,600, the living itself having cost £1,500. But that is not all. As mother church, it carries the patronage of five other livings, and in two of these are to be found gentlemen of the name of Armistead. I spoke a moment ago of auctions. Perhaps, the climax of indecency is reached when the cure of souls is knocked down to the highest bidder. Yet these auctions are of frequent occurrence. Perhaps, the incumbent is growing very old and infirm, and the living, which is in the hands of agents, does not go off. The incumbent grows older and more infirm. You throw the living on the market for what it will fetch. On the 12th of this month, the living of Broughton was offered at a public-house at Shrewsbury; on the 24th of last, St. Alkmond's, Derby, was offered at the Auction Mart, Tokenhouse Yard, together with the patronage of Little Eaton; of which the rector of St. Alkmond's, who offered it, is only the "official" patron. I am told that the whole emolument of Little Eaton, amounting to £300 per annum, is paid by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

Well, Sir, so much for this trade. Perhaps some one will say, at all events, we know the worst; it is no longer on the increase. Is that so? Mr. Bridges, who from his associations may be termed an ecclesiastical solicitor, was asked this question by the Lords' Committee:—"Has the sale of advowsons increased very largely within your experience?" He replied—"Very largely indeed." And Mr. Lee, who is secretary to many Bishops, speaks in the same strain. Now, Sir, perhaps some hon. Gentleman may say—"There is no doubt, something very unpleasant and unsatisfactory in all this; but, so far as you have gone, you have not shown that there is anything disreputable and dishonourable." I venture to think that there is a good deal which is discreditable in what I have shown already; but I will promise to convince the most sceptical and fastidious person of this before I sit down. For example, if this be an upright and honourable trade, it is remarkable that we find some of those who are the most actively engaged in it precisely the kind of persons which they appear to be. Lord Sydney Godolphin Osborne tells us that one of these agents was a few years ago a prosecutor for libel before the Bench at Worcester. He is the owner and publisher of the — Gazette.

"The defendant's counsel got out of this agent that his real name was —, and that he had good reason to change it. If you ask me, have I the slightest doubt in the world that he had been a convict, and that he had changed his name, I have no doubt of it, because the counsel put the question to him in open Court, and he admitted it."

Well, if the trade be pure, it flows through some singular channels, and through this particular channel it flows very freely indeed, because Lord Sydney Osborne laid before the Committee a copy of this gentleman's Gazette, dated the month before he gave his evidence—namely, April, 1874, which contained particulars of 182 advowsons, presentations, and exchanges.

And now, Sir, I come to the most painful part of my task; I mean the evidence which identifies this traffic in great measure with simony, or with what is only not simony through fraud and evasion. Mr. Bridges, whom I have already mentioned as an ecclesiastical solicitor, was asked this question—

“Can you give me any notion as to the extent to which simoniacal transactions go?”

He replied—

“I have no doubt whatever that they cover a very large area.”

He was asked again—

“Are you aware that any evil exists with reference to the exchange of benefices?”

He replied—

“It is very often made the means of simoniacal proceedings, I believe.”

And Mr. Lee stated that “evasions of the law are almost universal.” And no wonder, Sir, when we remember the unhappy confusion into which the clerical conscience appears to have fallen upon this point. Mr. Bridges was asked this question with regard to the late oath against simony—

“You think, it being a legal oath, persons not of a legal mind may not quite understand it?”

“Yes,” he replied, “such persons may be very much embarrassed; or else they may come to the conclusion, which I have often seen arrived at by clergymen, that the whole thing is an absurdity, and that they may get through the matter in the best way they can. That I know to be a very common state of mind.”

“Have you known instances of that kind?”

“Yes, there have been many instances in which I have been fortunate enough to stop proceedings of this kind, and there have been other cases in which I have not been so fortunate, but in which proceedings have gone on in spite of every remonstrance.”

And with reference to a most rascally transaction, particulars of which are given in the Blue Book, he was asked—

“May I ask whether the clergyman who did this was generally regarded as a respectable man?”

He replied—

“He was a thorough gentleman by position; he was a man of good family, and there was nothing whatever against his character. He did not belong to any very earnest school in the Church.”

But what says Mr. Few? Mr. Few is probably known to half the House. He has practised in ecclesiastical matters for half a century—

“Practically you have had considerable difficulty in getting clergymen to understand the stringent character of the late oath against simony, have you not?”

“Undoubtedly, even in the case of men of undoubted piety, and more particularly in the case of the oath, it is quite remarkable how dense they were in seeing what its tenor was; and I remember my father constantly dwelling upon this same point, that he had to read it over to them. These were men of undoubted piety, and yet they could not see that what they desired to do was against the oath.”

In fact, Sir, there is too much reason to fear that not only transactions of a simoniacal character, but blank simony, going to the length of the sale and purchase of a vacant living, has taken place. For Mr. Dunning, who for 20 years has been secretary to various Bishops, was asked this question—

“You could not put your finger on a positive case, (i.e., of a vacant living having been sold,) and say that it had been done; but you believe that it has been done?”

He replied—

“I believe that it has been done.”

And for my own part, I can draw no moral distinction between the purchase of a vacant living, and the purchase of a living with immediate possession, which is a matter of almost daily occurrence. Again, Sir, the House is no doubt aware that, by a statute of Queen Anne, clerks in Holy Orders are prohibited from purchasing next presentations. Yet even this is evaded, for we have the authority of Sir Robert Phillimore and Mr. Dunning for saying that clergymen purchase advowsons, “subject to a re-sale.” But perhaps the most frequent and most flagrant evasion of the law is, when a living falls vacant, and, in order that it may bring a better price, the oldest and most infirm man who can be found is put in, and the living advertized with a glowing description of his age and infirmities. Lord Sydney Osborne gave three instances which came within his personal knowledge. First, there was that of Spettisbury, in the diocese of Salisbury, where the incumbent died unexpectedly, and the population being 1,000 with two churches, a clergyman of the name of Basket was put in, a man of 80 years of age, and holding previously a small living, but licensed as non-resident on account of age and infirmity. Then he gave the case of Rougham, in Norfolk, with a population of 1,000, and an income of £800, to which a man of between 80 and 90 was instituted. But the worst case was that of St. Ervan's, in Cornwall, to which a clergyman named Cox was presented, who was "barely able to sit up in a chair." When he was taken there for induction, he had to be supported up the aisle by two persons, jelly and wine, or wine and water, were given him at the reading-desk, he was unable to finish reading the Thirty-nine Articles in the morning, and he died before the sale could be legally carried out. Then I may name the notorious case of Falmouth, a living worth £1,700 a-year, which fell vacant a year or two ago, and to which a clergyman, aged about 77, was instituted, and the living immediately thrown upon the market. But I need not detain the House by citing instances of this kind, for there is no hon. Gentleman who cannot recall similar cases.

Now, Sir, I suppose that it will be admitted upon all hands that a clergyman should be a man of good character? In every-day life we hear of physicians who devote their skill to some particular organ of the human frame. One man pounces upon your stomach, and another runs away with your lungs. Well, in clerical life we find something which is analogous. There are specialists there, too, and one of the most skilful of these is the man who applies himself to your diseased reputation, and who keeps the Bishop off your character. For example, the clerical convict, of whom I have spoken, having suffered in reputation himself, applies himself to the cure of those who are sufferers in the same line, and keeps a pocketful of livings for their relief. Lord Sydney Godolphin Osborne thus describes how he deals with one of these—

"Then a certain Mr. — was appointed; he was in many ways most objectionable. He at last got such a character that he resigned. Then he put in A. B. He and the clerical agent took the duty between them, the agent preaching; and the Bishop of Salisbury wrote to me that he had had more than 60 letters about A. B. At last his character became so obviously bad, that this agent moved him to the living of Q., where he prosecuted him for libel."

Finally, another clergyman named S., who had been subjected to an enquiry under a commission, was instituted to this useful living, coming from the diocese of Norwich. Now, all the Bishops in these cases were duly warned about what was taking place; but it seems that they were totally helpless to prevent the institution of these people, though they refused to countersign their testimonials, and we are expressly informed that this convenient living was not a donative. The Bishop of Peterborough, whose efforts in the cause of reform have been beyond all praise, delivered in 1875 a very powerful Charge, in which he thus referred to this point—

"Since I have been a Bishop, I have been called upon to institute four clergymen, of whom one was paralytic; another so aged and infirm that, on the ground of his age and infirmity, he asked me for leave of perpetual absence from the important parish to which I had just instituted him; a third was a reclaimed drunkard, who was presented to a benefice, situated only a few miles from the scene of his former intemperance; the fourth had resigned a public office—sooner than face a charge of the most horrible immorality, the truth of which he did not dare to deny to me. In each of these cases the facts were perfectly well known to the respective patrons. As regards every one of these, I was advised that I had no legal power to refuse institution."

Now, Sir, I cannot pretend to-night to describe to the House all the genera of simony or quasi-simony. It is enough for my present purpose to describe a few of the chief species. "The difficulty is," as one of the witnesses natively remarked, "that the persons interested want to anticipate the vacancy," and so they are driven into transactions which are illegal, or are only not illegal because the skill and experience of centuries are resorted to in order to maintain the letter of the law, while its spirit is violated in every direction. Now, let us put side by side this state of the clerical conscience and of the conscience of patrons with the flourishing character of the traffic—a traffic which defies the ordinary fluctuations of trade; let us put the fact that "evasions of the law are almost universal," and that "simoniacal transactions cover a very large area," side by side with the circumstance that prosecutions for simony are absolutely unknown, that no such case has come into Court for 40 years, and that the Bishops openly proclaim their utter helplessness in the present state of the law; let us group all these facts together, and then let me ask the House whether it is to say Aye or No to this Motion? I ask devoted Churchmen whether, bearing in mind the amount of opposition which the Church has often to encounter, and the kind of criticism to which it is everywhere subjected, this is a state of things which they can afford to leave unchanged? Two or three years ago an attempt was made to change it, and, in order to justify the terms of my Motion, I fear I must detain the House for a very few minutes while I sketch as briefly as possible the history of that attempt.

Now, what was the Bill for the Reform of the Patronage Laws, which ultimately found its way into this House? Those who remember the incidents of its existence in "another place"—where it led the life of a pantomime—will agree that we may well ask. I have no doubt, Sir, that there is no Member of this House who, in his younger days, has not amused himself by watching the transformations of a nimble little animal, which begins life as a transparent globule, and ends by becoming an expert swimmer and a prodigious jumper. The measure to which I refer went through precisely similar transformations; only, by a law of natural selection which would have puzzled Dr. Darwin, just in proportion as it approached maturity, it developed backwards. It began by jumping very high indeed, then its legs fell off and it became a tadpole; then its tail fell off and it became a mere globule of legislation, transparent and passive, and which you might pierce in any direction in search of the principle of vitality without finding it. And in that shape it passed into the hands of my right hon. Friend, the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole). It is no secret, Sir, that when the Bill was originally mooted it was intended to embrace the prohibition of the sale of next presentations. That was the intention of the right rev. Prelate who moved for the Committee. It was the opinion of the great majority of the witnesses examined. But when the critical moment arrived, and the right rev. Prelate who was in the Chair (the Bishop of Peterborough) had submitted his draft Report, all his Episcopal Brethren save one—the same Episcopal Brethren, bear in mind, who, as the Archbishop of Canterbury informed us at a subsequent stage, regarded the prohibition of the sale of next presentations "as vital to the Bill if it were to be of any real use"—I say all his Episcopal Brethren save one forsook him and fled, and the vital clause was struck out of the Report. But the Bill, as originally printed, still contained many important provisions which, before it arrived here, had entirely disappeared. What remained? The Bill abolished donatives. I wonder whether any hon. Member regards that as a great achievement? I wonder whether many hon. Members know exactly what a donative is? One of the witnesses called them "the cracked china of the Church," but I very much doubt whether they are the only infirm porcelain which that venerable edifice contains. A donative is a benefice to which you may present without troubling the Bishop, and which you may resign whenever you please. There are in all about 100 of them; and as regards the use which the clerical agents may make of them, let the House remember that in the worst case of manipulation by an agent which I have related to the House, we are expressly told that the benefice so manipulated was not a donative. Then the Bill abolished resignation bonds. That was simply to restore the law to the state in which it stood before the year 1827. It provided publicity. The Bishop was to keep a register of grants of advowsons. Is not the auctioneer's hammer publicity, and the 2,000 advertizements? Then the Bill declared the payment of interest upon the purchase money of an advowson illegal. As though any actuary could not calculate the value of the existing life, and deduct it from the principal! Finally, the Bishop was empowered to refuse institution for actual physical incapacity or when the presentee had passed the age of 75. And what, Sir, must be the state of the law when new legislation is required to empower the Bishop to refuse institution to a man who is so infirm that when he is once down upon his knees he cannot rise from them, or to withhold from raving lunatics the privilege of consoling us upon our death-beds?

Let me say just one word upon the rights of congregations. As the Bill was originally drawn, it was proposed to give to Englishmen some shadow of the privileges which you have given to every congregation, upon the other side of the Tweed. The congregation was to have the right of challenging improper presentations, and the Bishop was bound to attend to their remonstrance, and to try the case himself, or send it for trial before the Ecclesiastical Judge. But the clause was narrowed down to this, that if the congregation remonstrated, they were no longer to be liable to prosecution for libel, and that was all. If incredible doctrines, if intolerable practices, were about to be thrust upon us in the person of the new presentee, were we to have any right to remonstrate then? No, Sir, not so much as a whisper. I am told that there are societies, the whole scope of whose operations consists in the purchase of advowsons over the heads of congregations, and the imposition of men of extreme views, who may think it their duty to startle us by gymnastic services, or the exhibition of some Evangelical extravaganza. There was not a word in the Bill which could save us from the machinations of men who club together, less, as it seems to me, for the propagation of the faith than for the propagation of faction. There was not a word in it which could trouble the calculations of those whose spiritual earnestness finds vent—I quote the words of a right rev. Prelate—"less in discovering the right man for the living than in discovering the right living for the man." This whole system of sale and barter, of commission agents and advertizements and auctioneers—this whole system of fraud and evasion—a system which is so shocking that one of the Bishops tells us—"it cuts, as it were, into the very reason for the existence of a Church at all," was to receive no sensible discouragement from the cobweb legislation to which my right hon. Friend was willing to lend his name.

Sir, I ask my right hon. Friend, and I ask the House, to take higher and firmer ground upon this question. It is a House filled with Churchmen, and with those who wish well to the Church. Believe me, it is in no spirit of narrow sectarian jealousy that I speak. I regard the legitimate influence of the Church as a great Christian and Christianizing community, as an object of higher national importance than the equality of creeds before the law; and I hold that it would have been better for the Church, better for religion, better for common morality, if you had left this traffic in the dark, rather than that you should have poured this flood of light upon it, and then refuse to grapple with the facts. Why, Sir, if this traffic were carried on with the ordinary purposes of commerce, there is no merchant or manufacturer in this House who would not scout a trade besmirched all over by fraudulent evasion of the law. If it were a mere municipal appointment which was bought, you would send the man who bought it to prison. If it were a mere civil or military appointment, what should we think of the nation which bought its honour to the hammer, and flung its fame and safety upon the market? But what ought to be our consternation, when we remember that the object of all this fraudulent barter is a responsibility the most solemn which can devolve upon any man; that these spectators are huckstering with the most awful names upon their lips, and that when the bargain is complete, with their hands stained and their consciences seared by fraud, they are commissioned with the full authority of the Realm to take charge of the spiritual interests of the nation? Sir, I well remember the speech which a right hon. gentleman, now a noble Lord, Lord Selborne, once delivered in this House in defence of the Established Church. I remember that he closed it by a quotation noble and eloquent as the speech itself. He spoke of "the spiritual fabric of the Church" as "by the hands of wisdom reared, in beauty of holiness." I remember the cheers which greeted those words; and it is because in great measure I sympathize with them, that I claim from those who raised them a corresponding sympathy with the object of this Motion. If it be true that your Church is "reared in holiness and beauty," then, for very shame, if for no higher motive, I ask you to condemn and to arrest the practices of those who, in the words of an older and greater poet,

"Do traffic in the sanctuary, whose walls
With miracles and martyrdoms were built."

The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. HIBBERT, in seconding the Motion, said, he was sure that if the arguments urged in favour of it were fairly considered and attended to, they would be calculated to strengthen, rather than weaken the Church of England. The question had been dealt with on many occasions. Everyone seemed to be anxious to reform the present system of the sale of livings, but they had not been able to come to one opinion. A Commission which was appointed in 1865 to consider this subject recommended that for the then existing state of the law there should be substituted a declaration against simony, and added an expression of their opinion that the law on the subject of simony required revision. In 1870 the right hon. Gentleman the present Home Secretary brought in a Bill which had for its object the abolition of the sale of next presentations, and though the Bill came to an untimely death, his right hon. Friend had done good service by bringing the question before the House. In 1874 the Bishop of Peterborough brought forward this question in a most able and eloquent speech in the House of Lords, and the speech which he made and the Report of the Committee which he obtained were much stronger than the Bill which he afterwards introduced. He (Mr. Hibbert) believed that the Bishop had a real and honest desire to deal with this question, and that a great advance would have been made if his recommendations had been carried into effect. As a Churchman he (Mr. Hibbert) was not disposed to think that they could abolish the sale of livings altogether. He was not satisfied that the abolition of the sale of advowsons was one which was desirable, until he could find a better Body to whom things might be transferred. It had been suggested that they should be transferred to some popular Body; but from his experience in the North of England, where some livings were left in the hands of popular Bodies, he had no desire to see them transferred in that manner. The abuses which had taken place where such a system existed showed that it was a very disadvantageous one. He did not think that they were prepared at the present time to go so far as to say that advowsons should be abolished, purchased, and transferred to some other Body. But if they could not go to that extent, they could go a great length in doing away with the abuses of the present system. The greatest scandal and abuse arose from the sale of next presentations, and no serious inroad on property would take place if the sale of next presentations were abolished. The law ought to be defined with more strictness. Parliament might prohibit the public sale of this kind of property, and the congregation ought to be considered in the appointment of the minister. They knew that the congregation had a voice in Scotland, and though he should not think it would be advantageous that the congregation should have the entire selection, he thought that it was desirable that whenever a patron was appointed notice should be given to the congregation, and they should have time to make a representation to the Bishop if they objected to the man who was to be imposed upon them. The Home Secretary, when he introduced his Bill in 1870, said that the great majority of the clergy were in favour of the abolition of the sale of next presentations. The same might be said of the laity, and he (Mr. Hibbert) should like to know who was against it. He believed that there would be no difficulty in dealing with this question in a large and rational manner, and that the time had now come when it should be taken up by the Government. Though he seconded the Motion, he did not very much object to the Motion of the hon. Member for South-east Lancashire (Mr. Hardcastle).

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in view of the prevalence of simoniacal evasions of the Law and other scandals and abuses in connection with the exercise and disposal of private patronage in the Church of England, remedial measures of a more stringent character than any recently introduced into this House are urgently required."—(Mr. Leatham.)

MR. HARDCASTLE rose to move as an Amendment—

"That it is desirable to adopt measures for preventing simoniacal evasion of the Law and checking abuses in the sale of livings in private patronage."

He admitted that there was no very material difference between the Amendment and the Resolution of the hon. Member for Huddersfield. It appeared, however, to him that it was undesirable in an abstract Resolution to refer to attempted legislation in this House, and that the Amendment which he proposed practically raised the whole question. It was in the direction of the measure introduced by the present Home Secretary in 1870 that he (Mr. Hardcastle) advocated reform, and it was much to be regretted that that measure had not passed into law. The abuses to which the hon. Member had referred were abuses which were discreditable to the Church. No one could fail to admit the grievance and scandal of these sales; but he did not think that they presented any reason for disestablishing the Church. It was not very long since the power of appointing to seats in that House was matter of sale, and a Reform Bill for the Church of England would probably do as much good as the Reform Bill had done for the House of Commons.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is desirable to adopt measures for preventing simoniacal evasion of the Law and checking abuses in the sale of livings in private patronage,"—(Mr. Hardcastle),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he must claim the indulgence of the House for a few minutes; but he felt bound to say that in this case there was proof of abuse, and he hoped on whichever side of the House he might be sitting, he should never be found standing up for that which he believed to be an abuse. This was a matter with which he had endeavoured to deal by a Bill which he introduced as a private Member in 1870, and he did not desire to shrink from a single word he used on that occasion. In his mind, there was a considerable difference between the sale of advowsons and the sale of next presentations. He believed it would be to the great injury of the Church of England if private patronage were done away with. When a man had the right of presentation to a certain living—which, in his opinion, constituted one of the most important trusts which a man could exercise—that right was attached to certain property, and if he wanted to divest himself of that right, and to sell the advowson which gave it to him, he ought to be allowed to do so, but that he had no right to sell the next presentation which that right of advowson gave him. In his opinion, the taking of money for the sale of a next presentation was in the same category as the taking of money for giving a vote for a Member of that House. He could not see the distinction.

Mr. Hardcastle

If there was to be private patronage, somebody must hold the advowson. They could not say to a man that he should not sell the estate to which the advowson was attached, or that he should not sell the advowson separately from the estate. So far as the next presentation went, however, it was an entirely different thing. It was a right of presentation, and it was a trust, and he had no more right—indeed, he had much less right—to sell that trust for money to put into his own pocket than to sell his right to vote for a Member of that House. A good deal had been said about the Bishop of Peterborough's Bill, and the Committee of the House of Lords which sat upon this subject, but no attention had been drawn to the Resolutions which were almost unanimously passed by that Committee. He should like, therefore, very briefly to call the attention of the House to the recommendations of the Committee as to the direction in which legislation should go. In the first place, the Committee stated that they were of opinion that—

"All legislation affecting patronage should proceed upon the principle that such patronage partakes of the nature of a trust to be exercised for the spiritual benefit of the parishioners, and that whatever rights of property attached to Church patronage must always be regarded in reference to the application of that principle."

That was the great principle they all desired, and it was a sound basis to go upon. In the second place, the Committee recommended that—

"The exercise of the rights of patronage without due regard to the interests of the parishioners should, as far as possible, be restrained by law, and that the law should aim at preventing, as far as possible, the appointment of unfit persons."

In furtherance of these objects the Committee stated that it was desirable that publicity should be secured to all appointments of Church patronage. The Committee further went on to say, in which he quite agreed with them, that private patronage was of great value to the Church, and to strongly deprecate any alteration in the law which should take it away. These were the principles laid down in that Report. They enforced the point that the right of presentation was a trust to be exercised for the benefit of the parishioners at large, and not for the advantage of the holder's pocket. That was the principle of his own Bill, and it was also the principle of a Bill on the subject introduced by the Marquess of Salisbury, when he sat in the House, and he hoped it was a principle which would be unanimously sanctioned by the House. He was quite aware of the practical difficulty of distinguishing between the sale of a next presentation and the sale of an advowson; but he did not think the difficulty was insuperable. In reference to the Motion before the House, he would appeal to them, if possible, to come to an unanimous vote; and he would suggest that the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) should accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for South-east Lancashire (Mr. Hardcastle), which practically led to the same conclusion as his own. If the hon. Gentleman was willing to do that, he (Mr. Cross) would support the Amendment, and he hoped the House would do the same.

MR. LEATHAM said, after the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman and the admirable and important speech which they had just heard from him, he felt it would not be right to divide the House, and he would accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

MR. RAIKES was unwilling to hear this Motion adopted without entering his protest against the arguments of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. He challenged the accuracy of the illustration of which his right hon. Friend had made use, in comparing the right of advowson to the right to vote for Members of that House. If that doctrine were applied to its full extent, it appeared to him that an owner would not have the right to lease the property which gave him the vote. The recommendations of the Committee of the other House, that the right of appointment should be considered as a trust, appeared to him to be begging the whole question. The point to be determined was not whether the right of presentation was a matter of trust, but a matter of property, a right, no doubt, to be governed and controlled in the interests of decency and propriety, but yet a right which was a matter of property.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he never for a moment stated that the right was not in the nature of private property; but that it was property clothed with a trust, and a most sacred trust, to be exercised not for the benefit of the individual, but the whole community.

MR. WHALLEY also entered his protest against the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman, and complained of the practice of clergymen of the Church of England. Many of those men were abominable and atrocious sepoys, who were receiving the pay of the Church for protecting what was called Protestantism, while they were teaching other doctrines than those of the Church. He thought it desirable to go to the root of the evil, and that Parliament ought to take such measures as would get rid of the Established Church altogether, or apply such remedy to the evil as would be effectual.

MR. RAMSAY protested against the doctrines of the right hon. Gentleman and of the hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes), and contended that the parishioners had a right to elect their own ministers.

MR. FAWCETT thought there ought to be no misunderstanding upon this important question. They could not come to an unanimous decision except upon one point—namely, that they condemned in toto the sale of a spiritual charge, as if it were a horse or a picture; but they could not agree that there was any difference between the sale of advowsons and next presentations. What they objected to was that there should be such things as sales of next presentations, and that people should be subject to the scandal of such outrages. No Bill which allowed the sale of advowsons would meet with the general assent of the House, or would be regarded as a settlement of the question.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CHURCH PATRONAGE (SALE OF LIVINGS).

Resolved, That it is desirable to adopt measures for preventing simoniacal evasion of the Law and checking abuses in the sale of livings in private patronage.

ILLEGITIMATE INTESTATES' ESTATES (ENGLAND)—UPCROFT'S CASE.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

MR. COLMAN rose to call attention to the case of John Montagu Upcroft, an illegitimate, who died on 23rd of November, 1861, intestate; and to move for a Return of any allowances made out of the estate, and of any other application for allowance which have been made, and not acceded to by the Treasury. This responsibility did not rest with the present Government, but was commenced long before it came into office, and therefore he was not laying any blame upon the Treasury, who were only carrying out the decision of their Predecessors. Briefly, the facts of the case were as follows:—The Government had received a large sum of money, a small portion of which had been returned to certain relatives of the reputed father, while the claims on the part of the relatives of the mother had not been acceded to. John Montagu Upcroft and Mary Upcroft, the former being an illegitimate son of the latter, died within three days of each other. The mother died possessed of £30,000, and the son of £160,000, so that the sum there was to deal with was much larger than that involved in the discussion that occupied the earlier portion of the evening. The important part of the question depended upon the date of the deaths. Mary Upcroft died on March 20th, 1861, and her son died on March 23rd of the same year. John Upcroft was too ill to make a will; but on his death-bed, he expressed a great desire to make a will, leaving his property to his mother's relatives. If the son had died only two or three days before the mother, then the sum would have come entirely to the mother's relatives, and the statement made to him (Mr. Colman), was that out of the large sum of £190,000, £20,000 had been granted to the relatives of the father, while the claims on the mother's side from relatives who were in very great want had been disregarded altogether. In cases of this kind it was usual to say the mother was less to blame; and here was a case in which the mother's relatives had received no sum at all, and he put it to the House and Treasury whether this was not a case calling for due consideration at the hands of the Government. The Secretary to the Treasury might reply that this matter was closed long ago, and the House had heard of claimants arising after an interval of 40 years; but, in this case, all the claimants were known, the facts were indisputable, the relatives on the mother's side were not denied, and there was no fear of cousins or relatives arising to put in a claim. In this case a will was made in favour of the mother, and, but for an accident, the whole property would have gone to the mother or her relatives. He did not at that late hour wish to go into a long discussion; but he desired the House to believe that he had not drawn attention to the case hastily, and he had not alluded to the names in any way to give offence. The facts were very simple. The Treasury came into possession of nearly £200,000; and, while claimant's on the mother's side for a share of this were denied, claims on the other side with, he was bound to say, more influence, had been allowed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 27th June, 1877.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Committee—Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) (re-comm.) [160], debate adjourned. Withdrawn—Game Laws (Scotland) Amendment (No. 2) * [92].

QUESTIONS.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE asked the Postmaster General, Whether any and what steps have been taken to extend telegraphic communication between Ardfert and Ballyheigue, which is only six miles distant from Ardfert, is one of the most important Coast Guard stations in the South of Ireland, and where the want of telegraphic communication is often, in winter particularly, seriously felt?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, no steps have been taken to carry the telegraph to Ballyheigue, and as the estimated income falls very far short indeed of the expense that would be incurred, I fear I cannot hold out any hope of the communication desired being made at the public expense.

RESOLUTION. QUESTION.

MR. W. JOHNSTON asked the honourable Member for Cavan, If he will state to the House the terms of the Resolution respecting the Irish Magistracy which he has given Notice of his intention to move on the 17th of July?

MR. FAY: Sir, the terms of it are—That, in order to secure greater confidence in the administration of justice in Ireland, some regard should be had to the appointment of magistrates, and no member of the Orange Society should be appointed.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS.
QUESTIONS.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked, What Business Her Majesty's Government proposed to take to-morrow; whether they would take the Army Estimates; and when they would bring on the Education Estimates; and, also, whether any date was fixed for taking the second reading of the South African Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he must remind the right hon. Gentleman of the fact that the Government were not entirely masters of the time of the House. They had hoped, on Monday last, to make some progress with the Army Estimates, but only one Vote was agreed to. If those Estimates had been disposed of, the Government would have been able to take the South African Bill to-morrow. As it was now very near the end of the quarter, and as it was absolutely necessary to have Supply, the Army Estimates would be taken to-morrow, and also, he expected, a Civil Service Vote on Account. Probably, the Education Estimates would be taken on Monday; but he would be better able to say after seeing the progress made to-morrow. At present he was unable to name a day for the South African Bill. In any case, it would not be taken to-morrow.

MR. COGAN asked, When the Irish Education Vote would come before the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that at that moment he could not say, but would reply to-morrow to the Question.

MR. E. JENKINS asked, Whether, when the South African Bill was brought in, it would be the First Order of the Day?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: If not the First Order, it will have a prominent place on the Paper.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) (re-committed)
BILL.—[BILL 160.]

(Mr. Richard Smyth, The O'Connor Don, Mr. Charles Lewis, Mr. James Corry, Mr. William Johnston, Mr. Dease, Mr. Dickson, Mr. Redmond.)

COMMITTEE ON RE-COMMITMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the first six Orders of the Day be postponed till after the Order for Committee on the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) (re-committed) Bill."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. CALLAN said, that during his eight years' experience that was the first occasion on which the Leader of that House had come down on Wednesday, on behalf of the Government, and had made a Motion, the effect of which was to deprive private Members of their right to suspend and pass over certain Orders, that a particular Bill might be proceeded with. He (Mr. Callan) was sure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, remarkable as he was for the consideration he showed for the rights of private Members, must have had some very heavy force behind him from a certain section of hon. Members before he made the Motion he had just submitted. On seeing that the Permissive Bill had dropped, he (Mr. Callan) thought he also saw a chance of bringing on a Bill which he had upon the Orders for that day, and he had left Ireland last night on the chance of being able to get through the Summary Jurisdiction (Ireland) Bill, which, to his mind, was a measure of far greater importance than the Bill to which so exceptional a favour had been extended. It was well known that grave dissatisfaction had existed in Ireland for many years as to the constitution of the magistracy of that country, and still greater dissatisfaction had been expressed as to the unlimited powers that had been conferred upon them by the Habitual Criminals Act, which was passed in the year 1870 and 1871, and which was renewed under the title of the Prevention of Crimes Act, and that, too, without discussion at a late period of the Session, but not without a protest from one whom he might term the Nestor of the House—he alluded to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley). The Bill which he had put upon the Table of the House, the Summary Jurisdiction Bill, was of so essential a character that he had hoped it might be allowed to pass without division, in which case his objection to proceeding with the Sunday Closing Bill would, as far as he was concerned, have been overcome. He should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would so far modify his proposal as to enable that Bill to be taken, or he (Mr. Callan) would move, as an Amendment to the Motion before the House, that the Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill and the Game Laws (Scotland) Bill, which stood first on the Order Book, be both passed over in favour of the Summary Jurisdiction (Ireland) Bill; and when that was passed, as he was sure it would be, if it could be brought on without a division, he should not oppose too strongly the proposal to proceed with the Sunday Closing Bill. So important was the Summary Jurisdiction Bill believed to be that the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland had allowed it to pass a second reading without a division.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was infringing the Rule of the House, which prevented the discussion of measures that were not before the House.

MR. CALLAN said, although he had consulted the book of Sir Erskine May, he did not exactly know how far he might go in stating reasons why the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman should not be acceded to, and why so exceptional a proposal in favour of the Sunday Closing Bill should be rejected. The only reason he could imagine why such a proposal should be made was the tendency that had been so noticeable in favour of passing coercive measures, restricting the liberty of the people, and effecting in a manner peculiarly offensive to them class legislation. ["Oh, oh!"] He repeated the words "class legislation." [Cries of "Order!"] If the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) had a point of Order to raise, he might do so now. He (Mr. Callan) was not aware that he was out of Order, as he had endeavoured to keep strictly within proper limits since the Speaker had intimated his opinion. The Sunday Closing Bill, coming as it did from the North of Ireland, where there was a Sabbatarian tendency such as was found in some Scotch Sabbatarian constituencies, might not appear to the hon. Member for Dundee to be of a coercive character; but he (Mr. Callan) asserted that that House had always received with exceptional favour measures of a coercive tendency that were to be applied to the people of Ireland, and that class legislation of this character was always welcomed in that Assembly with open arms. As he was prohibited from discussing the merits of his own Bill, he could only say that the House ought to be very slow to sanction such a proceeding as that of the Government in coming down to the House of Commons on a Wednesday and proposing to deprive private Members of their privileges. Her Majesty's Government complained of obstruction on other evenings in the week by certain hon. Members who sat on that side of the House; but he asserted that the obstruction the Government had offered that day to private Members was quite as irritating and annoying as any obstruction that had been put in the way of Government measures during the present Session. He should offer his most strenuous opposition to the Motion, and though he was not often inclined to divide the House, he certainly should divide it on this occasion.

MR. O'SULLIVAN supported the opposition of the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan). He thought it too much that the Government should come down to the House and propose to take the only day private Members had for bringing forward their Bills. If that were to be allowed to pass over quietly, and if the Government were to be allowed to appropriate that particular day, why should they not propose to appropriate every other Wednesday during the rest of the Session? They would have as much right to do one as the other. He held that the Bill in favour of which that course was resorted to was a most inappropriate measure to hurry through the House that could well be conceived. He remembered that a Coercion Bill for Ireland had been passed in that House in a single day, and let hon. Members disguise the fact as they would, the measure they were asked to proceed that day with was a coercive measure. It was a Bill to deprive the people of their liberties and privileges. It was a class Bill, promoted by a small minority, for the purpose of depriving the large majority of the Irish people of their rights. He held, therefore, that it was wrong on the part of Her Majesty's Government to propose to suspend the Orders of the Day in order to pass this piece of special legislation. He hoped the House would mark its sense of what was proposed by disapproving of the action of the Government; and, for his part, he was determined to take a division on the Motion in order to test the feeling of the House.

MR. ONSLOW said, he also protested against the action of the Government in the matter. He did not think they had exercised a wise discretion in taking the course they had. The Summary Jurisdiction Bill would, if passed, be a far more useful measure to the people of Ireland than the obnoxious Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday Bill would be. The Bill, he believed, would be strenuously opposed, and he was glad of it. Indeed, he looked upon it as a Bill which would set a bad precedent with reference to England, and he would oppose it in every possible way.

MR. COGAN said, the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan) was under a slight mistake. Her Majesty's Government had not sought to appropriate that day at all. The fact was, that the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had in reality possession of that Wednesday, which it was well known would have been entirely occupied by his Permissive Bill, if he had persisted with it; but the hon. Baronet had given up his right in order that the Bill of the hon. Member for Londonderry might come on, as he felt that it was more likely to be brought to a successful issue than his own, inasmuch as it was a measure demanded by the great majority of the Irish people. ["No, no!"] If they came to a division on it, it would be seen by the votes of the Irish Members who were supposed to represent the majority of the Irish people, whether he was not perfectly accurate in that statement. It was not correct to say that the Government had interfered with the rights of private Members, the simple fact being that one private Member had given up his right to another private Member, Her Majesty's Government having sanctioned the arrangement.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. Cogan) had most correctly represented the state of affairs and the position assumed by Her Majesty's Government. At the same time, he was bound to admit that the proceeding was one that was not of a usual character. It was, however, one that had been adopted under somewhat unusual circumstances. An appeal had been made to Her Majesty's Government, for reasons into which he need not enter, to appoint a day on which the Sunday Closing Bill might be discussed. It appeared to the Government that it was reasonable that they should ask some assistance from private Members, Her Majesty's Government being willing to appropriate one day, if another could be found, and the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), upon a suggestion thrown out by him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), having volunteered to waive his right to discuss the Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill. Anyone who had watched the proceedings on that Bill must be aware that a discussion on its second reading would occupy the whole of the working hours of the day, and, consequently, that no other Bill—unless it were of a very formal character, such, perhaps, as that of the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan), and could be rapidly proceeded with—could have a chance of coming on. Under these circumstances the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle having agreed that such a step might be taken, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had proposed, on behalf of the Government, the course which alone would have induced the hon. Baronet to give way. He did not suppose that the hon. Baronet would have been induced to waive his right to proceed with the Permissive Bill for the sake of making way for the Summary Jurisdiction (Ireland) Bill. The hon. Baronet was under the impression, which might or might not be correct, that the Sunday Closing Bill was one of great interest to a large majority of hon. Members from Ireland; and it was on these grounds that the Government had agreed to make an exception to the usual course—an exception which was not out of Order, but was unusual—for the purpose of giving hon. Members an opportunity of discussing the Sunday Closing Bill. He hoped that the House would consent to the Motion he had made, especially under the circumstances he had stated.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it might be necessary that this proceeding should be taken, but the decision on the whole question rested with the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). The House would like to hear from the hon. Baronet whether he approved of the arrangement that had been mentioned.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he was sorry to be obliged to take up a moment of the valuable time of the House by joining in a frivolous debate like this, the only object of which was to delay the Bill it was proposed to proceed with. But, in reply to the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Newdegate), he could only say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had just now correctly stated the position of affairs, and he was greatly obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the Motion he had made. He had given up his Bill for the sake of facilitating the Irish Bill; and he hoped the House would not spend its time in idle preliminary talk, but would at once and in a business-like manner accept the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. GOLDSMID was opposed to both the Bills that had been referred to, and he wished to point out that three very unusual things had been done on that occasion. In the first place, they had the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), who had always evinced intense anxiety to bring forward the permissive question in which he was so deeply interested, waiving his right obtained in a Balot that had taken place in the early part of the Session to discuss his Bill. Then they had the Leader of the Government coming down on a Wednesday before the Government had appropriated the rest of the Wednesdays to their own Business, and taking the unusual course of moving that the other Orders of the Day be postponed in order that a Bill low down on the list should be taken out of its course. If it were only on that account he should say, as one who valued the privileges of private Members, that this was a most objectionable proceeding. It might be taken hereafter as a precedent. ["No, no!"] It was all very well to say that it would not be construed into a precedent. The same statement was always made on similar occasions; but the result was, that the precedent was followed as soon afterwards as the occasion for it arose. In the third place, they had this unusual state of things. They found the Government, which he believed really agreed with him (Mr. Goldsmid) in objecting to the Sunday Closing Bill, asking the House to do a thing that was irregular, in order that the Bill to which they objected might be taken as the First Order on a private Member's day. He would put it to the Speaker, whether he had ever, in his long experience, known such an extraordinary combination of irregularities in one proceeding before that House? He thought that the House ought to pause before adopting such a proposal as that now before it, not only because it was an infringement on the rights of private Members, but because it would set an example of such an evil character that he did not see how far they might not be called upon hereafter to hand over the conduct of private Members' Business to Her Majesty's Government. If the House were wise it would not accede to the Motion, to which he objected, though he was equally opposed to the Bill, which would be taken if it were not assented to, and to that which would be discussed if it were adopted.

MR. WHEELHOUSE viewed the proposal now made as one of the most extraordinary he had ever heard in that House. The position in which he was placed was this—that but for this Motion he might have had an opportunity of opposing another Bill which was set down as the First Order; and had that opportunity been given to him, the chances were that the Bill for which precedence was asked, and which he apprehended was even more objectionable than the Permissive Bill, would not have been brought forward that day, and probably not during the rest of the Session. Like the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Goldsmid), he regarded both these Bills as being about as objectionable as could be, and for this reason—both of them, under the guise of doing some good to somebody, proposed to interfere with the domestic habits and rights of the people at large. He did not care one straw whether the proposed interference was with the English or the Irish people. What he said was, that at any rate they ought not to be giving up to one hon. Member, who had a highly objectionable Bill on the Paper, a day that was set apart for the consideration of another Bill, although that was almost equally objectionable. These being his views, he must go into the Lobby with those who objected to the Motion.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING feared it would only be a waste of time if the Motion were carried, because he was well aware it was not the intention of the Government or those who were opposed to the Sunday Closing Bill that the question of going into Committee should be brought to a division. It was quite clear that the course intended to be taken was to talk the Bill out, and the only result of their proceedings that day would be a waste of the public time. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would get up and say he was determined to give every facility for the purpose of getting the Bill into and through Committee, it might possibly be arranged; but as they all knew that the Bill was to be talked out, it was mere waste of time to attempt to do anything of a practical nature.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply to the challenge of the hon. and learned Member for Cork, said, it was his earnest wish and desire that the House should go into Committee on the Bill and discuss the clauses, so as, if possible, to arrive at a settlement of the question.

MR. MACARTNEY said, the only difficulty generally had been that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Cork County (Mr. Downing) did not imagine that the Government would give facilities for the passing of the Irish Bill if the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) gave up his right as to the Permissive Bill; but now the Government had announced that they would afford these facilities he could not understand the course that was being taken, especially by hon. Members coming from Ireland.

MAJOR O'GORMAN said, the Government was never tired of passing coercive measures for Ireland, and when they could not find a coercive measure to bring in themselves, they invited private Members to bring them forward; and not only did they do this, but they deprived private Members of their right to bring in Bills, in order that other private Members might introduce coercive measures. That course of procedure was one which ought to be objected to by the House.

Order for Committee read.

MR. RICHARD SMYTH said, that after the statement which had just been made by the hon. and learned Member for Cork County (Mr. Downing), it would be very injudicious on his (Mr. Smyth's) part if he occupied the time of the House, as his hon. and learned Friend had expressed what was said to be the intention of a section of hon. Members in that House. He (Mr. Smyth) would not contribute to that result; but would simply thank the hon. Member for Carlisle for making a way for the Bill, and also thank the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for making the Motion which had given effect to his hon. Friend's intention. The principle of his Bill was so well known to the House and the country that he would do no more than move that the House resolve itself into Committee upon it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Richard Smyth.)

MR. MURPHY rose to move, as an Amendment—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is not expedient that the provisions of this Bill should be extended to the whole of Ireland.”

The hon. Gentleman said: Sir, in rising to propose the Resolution which appears in my name on the Paper, I have to ask the attention of hon. Members, while I proceed to lay before them the real position in which this question now stands; and, at the same time, afford them and the country the benefit of information which a late inquiry has, for the first time, brought to light. If I mistake not, this information will enable them to arrive at a conclusion precisely the reverse of that which this House has been induced to come to, on the second reading—a conclusion brought about, as I believe, by an undue and perhaps unconscious assumption of a state of facts which does not exist, and by the creation of an artificial so-called public opinion produced, in the main, by the persevering operations of a well-organized and active Association or Confederacy. Sir, that Confederacy has hitherto had an enormous advantage in its favour, in the generally accepted idea of the prevalence of wide-spread intemperance in Ireland, and particularly on Sundays. In fact, this idea has been a principal reason for the existence of the Confederacy, and I need scarcely say that its active agents have availed themselves of the advantage to the utmost of their power. What have they done? They come down to this House, and without even attempting to prove the fact, they broadly assert that wholesale intemperance prevails throughout the land, that the country is a nation of drunkards, and that the total closing of public-houses on Sundays will eradicate the vice; and they follow up these two false premises by roundly asserting that the people of Ireland are unanimously in favour of the measure. Give me leave to ask—Would they dare to propose such a measure to the people of England; would it not be scouted if they did; and can they for a moment suppose that they will be permitted to thrust down the throat of the people of Ireland an enactment which would not be received by Englishmen, and which would logically and necessarily give the imprimatur of Legislative authority to their patriotic proclamation, that Ireland is a nation of intemperates? Now, Sir, I think it would be convenient to the House, if I put them in possession, shortly, of the history of this question, and asking for their indulgence as I do, I venture to hope that I shall not abuse it. It is now just 10 years since a Bill somewhat of this nature was introduced. A similar Bill was introduced at the same time for England, by the late Mr. Abel Smith, and both Bills stood on the Paper for second reading on the same evening, the English Bill being first. I came into the House about half-past 12 on that night, and, to my astonishment, found that the Member in charge of the Irish Bill (my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Langford) had moved the second reading, the English Bill having been postponed. I, however, gave Notice that I would oppose the Order for going into Committee; and I accordingly did so, and moved that it should be referred to a Select Committee, and carried my Motion on a division. It was then too late in the Session to proceed further, and in the following year I urged that a similar Bill should be read a second time on the understanding that it should be referred to a Select Committee, and that the Licensing Laws should form part of the inquiry. A similar course was adopted with regard to the English Bill. Both Bills were accordingly referred, and both Committees reported against them. The Report on the Irish Bill was unanimously against total Sunday closing, and a limitation of the hours was suggested—namely, that 9 o'clock P.M., in towns of over 5,000 inhabitants, and 7 o'clock P.M., in towns under that number, should for the future be the closing time on Sundays. In the year 1869 or 1870, a Bill was again brought in by the hon. and gallant Member for Langford, and I think a Bill also by Sir Dominic Corrigan; but finally, in 1872, the Act which now regulates the question of closing was brought in and passed by the Government of the day both for England and Ireland, and the precise hours recommended by the Select Committee on the Irish Bill for Closing on Sundays were adopted for Ireland. Perhaps I may mention that the late venerated Archbishop Leahy was one of the witnesses examined before the Committee—and it is needless to say that he was a strong advocate for Sunday closing—but although they were put in full possession by him of the nature and effects of the voluntary system adopted by his advice and influence throughout his diocese, the Committee were unanimously of opinion that a restrictive and compulsory legislative enactment would not attain the same results; and it is to be noted that one half the Committee had voted in favour of the Bill. Well, Sir, on the passing of the Act of 1872, it was naturally thought that there was a settlement of the question; and so, indeed, it has proved so far as England is concerned. But very soon afterwards it appeared that the United Kingdom Alliance was formed, with a capital of £250,000, for advocating the Permissive Bill, and as stated by some, the ultimate suppression of the liquor traffic. They did not attempt to revive the question of Sunday closing in England directly, or at least actively; they knew that the feelings and habits of the people would revolt against it, but they willingly lent their co-operation and sympathy to the Sunday Closing Alliance in Ireland, judging, perhaps, that as regards their ultimate operations in England, the experimentum in corpore cili might be successfully tried on in Ireland; and hence, no doubt, the result of this holy alliance has been the agitation in that country and the production of the Bill now before the House. In favour of this Bill there is no demonstration made by the masses. They are contented with the settlement of 1872. They do not complain that they are demoralized, intemperate, and incapable of self-restraint, owing to the operation of the present liquor laws. Yet this Association, assuming to be the representatives of benevolence and humanity, with a large, well-paid, and methodized Staff, sit down in their central bureau, take the Ordnance map, divide the country into portions, and send out their agents to canvass for signatures in favour of the Bill. They establish themselves in every town, they prepare forms of Petition against Sunday opening as a cause of intemperance, which are readily signed by Boards of Guardians and other local bodies. But, Sir, they go further. They procure by private canvass, and by means best known to themselves, the signatures of electors in various localities to a form of requisition or remonstrance addressed to their representatives in this House in favour of the measure. Those requisitions, which are not adopted at public meetings, are sent from a central association in Dublin to hon. Members of this House by the secretary, with a letter couched in polite and affable terms, as if it emanated from their constituents, and requesting that due attention be paid to it, and its prayer supported. Must not every hon. Member receiving such a communication feel surprised and indignant at such a course? I question very much if such a course of conduct might not be considered an infringement of the privileges of this House, as it is plainly pursued with the object of compelling hon. Members to vote in a particular manner. I find that in 1874 the advocates of this Sunday-closing movement sent round a paper stating that the House of Commons divided, and that there were 42 Irish Members in favour of Sunday closing; but on looking at the Division List I found there were only 29. When the promoters of this Bill say that the unanimous consent of the people of Ireland—the preponderating opinion of all classes—is in favour of it, I deny altogether the accuracy of their statement. They have endeavoured to impose on the House by signatures to Petitions obtained God knows how. There is one class of persons specially interested in this measure. They do not ask for it. Is it right for others to legislate for them against their will? The promoters of this Bill are bound to prove that there is such an amount of intemperance in Ireland as to make legislative interference necessary. No one can say that interference would be improper to prevent a man from injuring himself or his neighbour; but to measure the amount a man is to drink when he is not injuring his neighbour or himself is an unjustifiable interference with personal liberty. I do not deny that the advocates of the measure are influenced by good motives; but I cannot conceal from myself the suspicion that selfishness enters largely into the calculations of many of the instruments in the movement. I think the promoters of the movement are bound to prove that there exists such an amount of intemperance in Ireland on Sunday as will justify Parliament in stepping in to close the public-houses on that day.

But that is not all. They are bound to show a remedy. They are also bound to prove that the closing of public-houses on Sundays would get rid of this intemperance. Again, they are bound to show that the class for whose benefit this measure is asked desire it. The statements of the promoters of the Bill are untrue; and, if true, the proposed remedy would be inefficacious. The promoters of this Bill come here with the broad assertion that such an amount of intemperance exists on Sundays as renders this day a day of scandal, of disorder, of insubordination, and of riot, and they therefore assert that the Legislature is bound to interfere and put a stop to such a state of things. But it is a fact that they have never taken the trouble even to prove their assumption. They seem to think there is no occasion to prove it, and they ask everyone who is against intemperance to back up their opinions without subjecting them to the light of facts. Since this agitation commenced, a Select Committee, which the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland moved for on the occasion of the second reading of this Bill, has been appointed, with limited powers, restricting the inquiry to five large towns specified by the Chief Secretary. I objected to the nature of that Committee. I think I used the words, that I objected to a fragmentary inquiry. If there was to be an inquiry, I said, let it be into the whole subject, and do not limit it to five towns, because it affects every urban population, more or less, and it equally affects every populous place, and on principle I cannot see why, if you are to have an inquiry at all, and if you are to upset the Report of the Select Committee of 1868, you are to restrict that inquiry to five towns. Of course, there was no use in my doing anything further than saying that, as the Government proposed that the Committee should confine its inquiries to Dublin, Cork, Limerick, Belfast, and Waterford. There was no help for it. The Select Committee was appointed, and they went to work. Now, up to that time, there never was any inquiry made into the truth of the assertion as to the positive amount of intemperance in any one district in Ireland on Sundays. No statistics were ever produced in this House showing whether the broad grounds on which the proposers of this Bill come to Parliament are in fact true or not; but now I have before me in figures the result of the inquiry which took place before the Select Committee. I crave the House most earnestly to give me their attention while I state what I have not the slightest hesitation in saying will, after all the exaggerations that have been made, and all the settled and quasi-settled opinions which have been brought forward as to the amount of drunkenness existing on Sundays, put the matter in a different light, and I will only quote the figures furnished by officials whose duty it is to take account of what is passing in Ireland. I will take Belfast, with a population of 210,000. I have a Return here for the eight years from 1869 to 1876, showing the total number of arrests for drunkenness in each year, distinguishing Sundays from the other days of the week. The average number of arrests in Belfast for each of the eight years is very similar. In 1869 it was 9,239; in 1870, 8,776; in 1874, 7,014; in 1876, 7,192; but the average of the eight years shows the number of arrests per year to be 7,962. That would give a daily average of about 22 persons arrested for drunkenness in Belfast. Now we come to the Sunday, the most drunken day, it is said, in the week; the one in which the artisans and labourers have the greatest leisure; the one that has been paraded as such a monstrous excrescence in Ireland, that the Legislature is called upon in God's name to interfere to try and put a stop to the present state of things. Well, what does the House think was the number of arrests on Sundays? It was 476 for the whole year 1869, 439 for the next year, then 399, then 418, then 464, next 376, next 445, and 422 in the last year. There is a series of eight years taken, and it is found that the average number of arrests per Sunday in Belfast is only eight, as against a daily average of 22 for the whole year. I really do not know how it is that the promoters of this Bill come down to this House, and ask us to pass an Act for closing all public-houses in Ireland on Sundays, when the statistics and official Returns produced by witnesses above suspicion show that not only is there not an excessive amount of intemperance on Sundays, but that it is the day above all others in which there is the least amount of drunkenness. Next I come to Dublin, with a population of 337,000. The number of arrests last year was 12,702, giving an average of 32 per day for the whole year. An enumeration was taken and laid before the Select Committee by the authorities in Dublin, showing the number of persons arrested on Saturdays, on Sundays, and on Thursdays during the months of November, December, and January last. The number appearing to have been arrested on Saturday was 919; on Thursday, which was selected as an intermediate day in the week, it was 453; and on Sunday it was 308, or one-third of the number arrested on Saturdays, and 50 per cent less than the arrests on Thursdays. Now, taking those three months as a guide for the year, the average per day for Saturdays was 70, for Thursdays 34, and for Sundays only 23. If statistics are right, if official information is right, if facts are all that is wanted to enable this House to form a judgment, where can you go further than you have done in this direction, and what justification do these Returns show for the promoters of this Bill to come down to this House and reiterate the broad declaration that Sunday in Ireland is a day of intemperance, disorder, and riot? With what face can these hon. Gentlemen come into this House, after these statistics, and ask this House to stultify itself, the facts and figures showing the very opposite of their contention? Now, I will turn to the city of Cork. That city has a population of 80,000 inhabitants. Everybody who knows anything of Cork knows that it has a large migratory population, and that it is a garrison town with a considerable military force. There is not a day in the week that sailors do not arrive there and depart; not a week that emigrants do not come into Cork and embark for America, or land in Cork on their return to this country. It is a thoroughfare between the Old and the New Worlds; so that, independently of its 80,000 inhabitants, it has a large migratory population; and a population of that class which, more than any other, would be likely to come under the supervision of the police. Well, what is the Return for Cork? The resident magistrate, Mr. Macleod, who was examined before the Select Committee, produced a Return for a period before the passing of the Licensing Act of 1872, and a Return for a period subsequent to the passing of that Act. He gave the total number of arrests on Saturdays and Sundays for each of three years, which, with the permission of the House, I will read. The total number of arrests on Saturdays in 1870 was 546; in 1871, 503; and in the next year 463. I beg the House to mark these figures. When I contrast them with the Sunday arrests, what do I find? Whereas in the year in which 546 were arrested on Saturdays, the arrests on Sundays were 272. In the next year, when there were 503 arrests on Saturdays, there were only 256 on Sundays; and the 463 in the following year contrasted with 231 on Sundays, giving an average of the three years of about five persons arrested each Sunday in the three years for drunkenness. For 1874, 1875, and 1876, years in which there was a greater amount of supervision by the police under the new licensing law, we have a further Return, and although that Return shows an increase in the number of arrests on Saturdays, yet no palpable increase is shown in the number of arrests on Sundays, except in one year. In 1874 there were 625 persons arrested on Saturdays, while the arrests on Sundays were 227. In 1875 there were 630 on Saturdays, and 283 on Sundays; but in 1876 there was an increase in the arrests on both days, the number being 830 and 370 respectively. A special reason is given in the evidence before the Committee for that increase, and it is only right I should mention it to the House. It appears that last year a section of the Roman Catholic clergymen in a certain district of Cork, which was not the most reputable portion of the city, felt it their duty to use every possible effort for the purpose of eradicating certain dens of infamy existing within that district. The measures they took were such as only the Catholic clergy of Ireland could use, and their efforts were successful in clearing out those places. But one consequence of this was, that the unfortunate inmates being deprived of any other place to go to crowded the worst class of public-houses, and so swelled the amount of drunkenness and the number of arrests. The resident magistrate has furnished us with a summary also for the five years, including 1876, of the total number of arrests on Saturdays, Sundays, and Thursdays. The number of arrests on Saturdays for the five years was 3,281, on Thursdays 1,672, and on Sundays

1,411. That is, as he summarizes the Returns in his own words, "five arrests on Sunday against six on Thursday, and as against 12 on Saturday." Now again I ask, what justification have the promoters of this measure to come down to this House at all? Where is the case which it was presumed they had made? Where is this widespread intemperance on the Sunday? What right have they to come to this House and, upon a general assumption of insobriety and disorder, ask for a measure to put a stop to that which upon inquiry it is found does not exist? And, Sir, I am by no means surprised at the desperate attempts which have been made by the promoters of this measure to hurry it through the House, to carry it "at a run," as they call it, after what must inevitably take place in Ireland now that these Returns have been published. What has taken place in my own town? I have personally been told, when last I was in Cork, and by the letters I have received from men who were notorious advocates for Sunday closing—men who have again and again asked me why I am opposing this Bill—men who signed Petitions in favour of it, they have come to me and said—"Oh, Mr. Murphy, we have read the evidence given before the Committee, and it seems there is no reason for this Bill at all. We believe it is a tyrannical measure, and that the masses who are not given to intemperance will justly resent it if it is passed." A very respectable gentleman said to me—"If this measure passes a brooding discontent will rise up amongst those who are respectable, who have never drank to excess, and who do not want a stigma cast upon them. These men will find themselves injured, and will look upon themselves as Pariahs, and no one will be able to tell what may arise from the feelings of discontent which it will engender." I will now pass on to some facts and figures relating to Limerick, which will show the real state of existing affairs, and make the House wonder that any body of Gentlemen can come down to the House to ask for a measure upon assurances disproved by official witnesses. The population of Limerick is 39,000, and from official Returns I find the total number of arrests during the year 1875 was 3,235, and in 1876 the number was very similar, 3,262. This will give an average of nine persons arrested per diem for intemperance. On Sundays I find that in 1875 the number of arrests was 307, or an average of six against an average of nine; in 1876, the Sunday arrests were 279. These are not exceptional years, but the fair average, and being drawn from official evidence, afford a good ground for judging of the habits of the people, so far as can be officially done. Does that show Sunday to be a day of exceptional intemperance? Does that show, in the judgment of this House, that, so far as Limerick is concerned, there is any necessity for stringent legislative enactment? Does that show there was any ground for interfering with the settled habits, tastes, and opinions of the people? Does that show that this House has any need to step in, and on Sunday, the only day in the week when the people have an opportunity to meet together to chat over family or other matters, to say to 'them—"This is the day on which you shall have all the public-houses closed?" I say that the good sense of the House ought to feel insulted and, as it were, befooled, if now that the general allegation which has hitherto been made, and which has for the first time been disproved, is not withdrawn, and if we are still asked to pass this measure, which it has been shown is not applicable to the country, and will, if passed, cast an undeserved stigma upon the people of Ireland. Now I come to Waterford. In Waterford there is a population of, I think, 29,000. The official Returns of arrests given for 1876 show that they numbered 1,459, or a daily average of four persons. I happen to have, in this case, a very curious Return of the number of arrests for every day in the week. On Mondays there were 268 arrests, on Tuesdays 219, on Wednesdays 172, on Thursdays 162, on Fridays 169, on Saturdays 335—just double—and on Sundays 134. This shows an average of arrests on Sundays of $2\frac{1}{4}$, as against an average daily arrest of 4, and as against an average of 8 on Saturdays. I cannot, again, help expressing my surprise that with these facts and figures at hand, and with more of the same kind in the possession of the Association, hon. Gentlemen promoting the measure can come to the House and say—"The Sunday in Ireland is a most drunken, disorderly day, and we ask the House to interfere for God's sake, and throw its legislative segis over us for protection against this terrible vice of drunkenness." I cannot but feel indignant that in the face of inexorable facts such a call should be made. Having given the daily number of arrests in the five towns, and brought out the proportion for each day, showing how much less drunkenness there is on Sundays than on any other day, I will now give a succinct summary of the aggregate Returns for the eight years. The total population of the five towns is 691,000, the yearly arrests were 28,515, giving an average of 79 persons per diem; while the arrests on Sundays were 2,453, giving the proportion per diem of Sunday arrests as $46\frac{1}{2}$ or 47, as against 79 for the other days of the week. Again, Sir, I ask how is it possible to justify the charges which have been brought against the Irish people, and the people of those five towns in particular, in the face of these Returns? But, Sir, independently of these Returns we have other Returns of an interesting character to which I now desire to call the attention of the House. These Returns give us the total number of arrests in Ireland in the year 1876, as well as the total number of arrests upon Sunday in the same year, and it is curious to observe how those amounts approximate in ratio to the figures I have already given, showing how much akin in their habits are the urban and the rural populations in Ireland. Well, Sir, the total number of arrests in Ireland in that particular year—1876—was 95,684. That being the total number of arrests for the entire year, the proportion of them which would belong to Sunday would be 14,000; but what will the House think was the actual number? Why, Sir, instead of being 14,000, the total number of arrests on Sunday was only 9,490, or less than 10 per cent. Test these figures in whatever way you wish, twist them and turn them about as you will, and still the same result is brought out. Again, then, I say there is no pretence for the advocates of this measure coming here and asking the House to pass it into law. They cannot be ignorant of these facts, and, therefore, they either entirely forget them, or totally ignore them. Having gone through these Returns with regard to the total number of arrests in Ireland for the year as contrasted with those which took place on Sundays, there is one other point to which it is necessary I should direct the attention of the House before I leave this branch of the subject, and that is the fact that the number of arrests for intemperance, whether we take those for the whole of Ireland or those for the principal towns, is no criterion whatever as to the number of individuals charged with that offence. What I mean to say is, that the amount or number of committals does not square with the fact that there were the same number of distinct persons arrested. I have proofs of this of the most striking kind, obtained from the Courts of petty sessions, from the magistrates, and from other official sources. Take, for example, the city of Waterford. The information I obtained there illustrates the fact which I wish to impress on the attention of the House. The average number of arrests on Sunday in Waterford is 134, and when I asked the clerk of petty sessions how many of the persons charged were known to the magistrates as habitual drunkards, he told me that very nearly one-half of them were of that description, so that Return does not concern more than about 60 persons. The Governor of Cork Gaol has also given me Returns for the years 1872, 1873, 1874, and 1875, and they go to show the total number of committals for these four years with the total number of individuals committed; and it may interest the House to have them stated, as they further exemplify my proposition. The total number of men, taken individually, committed to Cork Gaol in the course of these four years was 1,674, and the total number of women, similarly regarded, 1,125—making in all 2,799 distinct persons, but what was the number of committals? Why, Sir, they numbered 5,118. The average number of distinct persons committed to Cork Gaol in each of those years was 699, or, in round numbers, 700; whereas the average number of committals was 1,280, so that the House will again see what I am trying to impress upon its attention, that the number of committals is no criterion whatever of the number of distinct persons sent to prison. It does not follow that because there were 5,118 committals that there were 5,118 distinct persons committed, for, as the Return shows, they did not exceed 2,799. I have, moreover, taken the trouble to consult a very valuable Return, which was moved for by Colonel Ackroyd, at one time a Member of this House, and it affords materials for contrasting the several counties in Ireland with that of one county where Sunday closing has been voluntarily adopted at the instance of the late Archbishop of Cashel, the most rev. Dr. Leahy. The Return shows the result which that good and esteemed Prelate brought about; but even with all his personal influence, aided by all the influence which attached to his clerical standing, he was not able to do in a moment all that he has done. The good Archbishop did not rely on "hey, presto!" legislation. He did not say—"Pass a Bill, and at once produce an effect." His evidence shows that it was not by any sudden edict published from the altar upon a Sunday, or by any ukase, if I may use the word, that he has brought about the reform which is associated with his name. He himself describes the process which he adopted, and which it took him some years to work to any real effect. He went about from parish to parish in his diocese, speaking to publican after publican upon the subject, until at length he brought about a general consensus of opinion in regard to it; and hence the voluntary closing of public-houses on Sunday throughout his archdiocese in the county of Tipperary. That consent was to some extent attributable to religious influence; but if the Archbishop had attempted to bring it about at once, he might as well have attempted to change the winds of Heaven. It was by a slow and tentative process, and by that alone, he was able to bring about a change which has been productive of extraordinary good to the people of Tipperary, and I believe that the same result could be brought about in all the other counties of Ireland by the same means. I say that the only mode of carrying out a reform such as this, is by moral suasion. Instruct the people; hold out to them good examples; find for them better dwellings, so that the wretched condition of the poor man's home may not drive him for comfort to the public-house, and there will not be any longer a semblance of an excuse for the introduction of a measure such as this; for it is a libel—it is a gross and unjust libel on the people of Ireland to say that legislation like this is necessary to preserve them from the vice of intemperance. You have to deal with a great difficulty, and one of a very exceptional character, and therefore we should deal with it temperately; but do not brand the people of Ireland as drunkards that you may bring about a change which everyone will admit is good and well-intentioned. The means by which you attempt it are not the right means. I have here a Return which contrasts the condition of the people of Tipperary with that of the people of Cork, and contrasts the people of Tipperary with themselves, both before and after the voluntary closing, and the figures will, I think, speak for themselves. The number of persons committed in 1869 to gaol in Tipperary, where the population is considerably less than in Cork, was 2,150. In the same year the number committed to gaol in Cork, where the population is very nearly one-half as much greater than it is in Tipperary, was just 1,357. In the next year, when the ukase came in force, the number committed in Tipperary was 1,562. This diminution I regard as a most gratifying result. I now turn to Cork, and find that the number of persons committed there was only 781, as contrasted with 1,357 in the previous year, showing that the population in both counties was even then becoming more moderate in regard to the use of intoxicating drink. Passing over a decade of years, I come to 1870, 1871, 1872, and 1873, and I find that in the first-mentioned year the committals in Tipperary were 1,343, in the second 1,106, in the third 797, and in the fourth 1,055. The same diminution is observable in Cork, where the committals, taking the same four years, were respectively 1,701, 956, 1,076, and 645. I have taken these two instances to show this, that it is altogether a mistake to suppose that intemperance is progressing in Ireland. There may, perhaps, be more whiskey and more potheen consumed, or at least made for consumption, by the people now than heretofore, but it is a most undeniable fact, based upon evidence, that intemperance has not increased among the people; and most distinctly do I deny that intemperance has increased there upon Sundays, the day when there is the greatest temptation to it, but when, as a rule, the greatest order and sobriety prevail among the people. Having given the House these particulars, it is now my duty to refer to the opinions of official witnesses given before the Select Committee as to the effect of Sunday closing, as that is the real question which the House has now to consider. You have not so much to consider what is the amount of intemperance. I believe myself it is, relatively speaking, infinitesimally small. But it is the remedy for it you have to look to, for that is the real fact which ought to engage the attention of the House. If it can be shown by the evidence of men above all partisanship, who are impartial and beyond prejudice or suspicion, and who give their opinion under the weight of responsibility—men who are by the nature of the office which they fill able to form the best opinion upon the subject—that Sunday closing in Scotland has not led to all those advantages which the advocates of this measure claim for it, and if it can be shown by the same class of evidence that it is not likely to lead to any better results in Ireland should it be adopted there, then, I think, the House will pause before it passes this Bill. I will now direct your attention to the evidence of the official gentlemen examined before the Select Committee. Before I go to that, it may be desirable to show what is the opinion of men capable of forming a correct opinion with regard to the working of what may be called the analogous system in Scotland. As I have already observed, a great deal has been said by the advocates of this measure of the working of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act in Scotland as a reason why Parliament should accept their proposal. They say—"See how it works; see the benefits which it has conferred on that country. Why not try the same experiment in Ireland that has been tried in Scotland with such marvellous results! Let us make Sunday in Ireland a sober Sabbath, and as grave as it is in Scotland." That would be very well, all other things being alike; but is it true that the Forbes-Mackenzie Act has produced such an amount of temperance in Scotland as the advocates of this measure allege? Is it true that there is less drunkenness there now than there was before the passing of that Act? Is it not, on the other hand, notorious that it is all the other way? Again, is it not the fact that the object of the authors of that Act was not so much to suppress intemperance—which, of course, if they could, they would be very glad to do—as to enforce a greater outward observance of the Sabbath, which, according to traditions and Scotch feeling, the whole country were anxious to preserve, and to which they willingly subscribed? Permit me on this point refer to the experience of Mr. Badenoch Nicholson, the secretary of the Lord Advocate. Being asked as to what had been the effect of that Act upon the habits of the working classes, if he thought they abstained from the use of alcoholic drinks on Sunday, and if not whether they acquired them illicitly, or whether they laid in a store, his answer was, that it was difficult to form an opinion, but he was afraid he could not represent it in the light of having led to a diminution of intemperance on Sunday; that he thought the motive of those who got the Act passed was more a consideration of good order, than an expectation that it would increase temperance. I think you will agree with me that these facts as regards the working of the system in Scotland ought to make the House pause and consider before extending it to Ireland, even if they thought it necessary, where the habits of the people are entirely different. I do not see what would justify us in passing a law which would lead to secret and illicit drinking, an evasion of the law, and that which has never yet prevailed in Ireland—the introduction of spirits into the homes of the people, to be drunk in the presence of their wives and children, and so gradually pave the way to the corruption of the morals of both—a result which cannot fail to be very terrible in its consequences. I will now refer the House to the evidence of Captain Talbot, the Assistant Commissioner of Police in Dublin, who was examined before the Committee on this question. He says, in answer to an inquiry, that he thinks the total closing of public-houses on Sunday would drive the people to other places in search of stimulants; that, as a rule, the people did not drink before 2 o'clock on that day; that they then wanted a glass of beer at their dinner, and that they sent to the public-house for it. That had reference to a fact which had been proved before the Committee, that the greater portion of illicit drinking in Dublin takes place before the houses are open. What, then, is the logical sequence of all this? If illicit drinking takes place now, when the houses are open for a certain portion of the day on Sundays, how much more will it prevail if they be closed throughout the whole of that day? He was then asked if, supposing it were possible to put a stop to the illicit sale of drink, what would be the effect of the Bill; and he replied that the only answer he had to give to that question was that if they made it possible for a man to obtain drink legally he would buy the drink in regularly-licensed houses; that he was entirely against the total closing; and that he did not think it right the working classes should be deprived of the opportunity of obtaining what was necessary refreshment. I would now ask the House if that evidence is not beyond suspicion and impartial, given as it was under official responsibility. Captain Talbot's evidence goes to show that the total closing of public-houses on Sunday would intensify the evil that already exists, and while it would not prevent the drunkard from getting drink, it would shut out the respectable tradesmen and artisans from obtaining it. In point of fact, it would punish the vast majority of the respectable citizens in order that the minority might be experimented upon, and the Bill ought not, in the interests of the minority, to be allowed to pass into an Act of Parliament. Another witness, Sub-Inspector Corr, was asked—

"You say there is less drunkenness on Sunday than on other days in Dublin. How much of that is to be attributed, do you think, to the earlier closing of public-houses?"

His reply was—

"The parties who go in to drink at those respectable public-houses do not go in for the purpose of indulging in drink. They go in more for the purpose of companionship, to have their chat over their glass of whatever they are taking than anything else. Those that go in at an early hour on Sunday are a very respectable class. They are very young men in some of the most respectable commercial establishments in the city of Dublin. I know that those who resort to these respectable houses on Sunday do not go in there, and they would not be tolerated in one of these houses, if they were under the influence of drink. I have never seen a man come out of one who was under the influence of drink."

That is the testimony given by a man who had the best opportunities of forming an opinion on the subject. In these respectable houses there is no such thing as excess. Sunday is of all days in the week the one on which there is the least intemperance, and yet you are asked to punish the public-houses and the people who frequent them for the experiment of trying to wean drunkards from their evil courses. I will refer briefly to the evidence of two other witnesses, who are important from the position they occupy and from their ability to form an opinion upon the subject. One of those witnesses is a highly respectable gentleman, a man of most conscientious opinions, and one who entertains very strong feelings on the subject of the closing of public-houses on Sunday. At the same time, he is a gentleman who would not give an opinion he did not believe to be true. I allude to the Recorder of Dublin, Mr. Falkiner. He is one of the most active sympathizers with the measure. The House will see how far the Report expresses his opinion as to the concrete right—if I may call it so—of passing such a measure as this. Mr. Falkiner says—

"I may state that, in coming over to give evidence before this Committee, if it had not been for the principle of this measure having been affirmed by the vote of this House, and by what I believed to be a very large weight of public opinion in Ireland, I should hesitate much indeed to express my strong view upon it, because I should be very sorry to take from the people a single pleasure which they have at present which is consistent with their welfare, and, on the other hand, I should be most desirous, according to my humble judgment and ability, to add to them as many as might be, and I recognize that much, with regard to the future of this measure, necessarily rests upon speculation; but, at the same time, having regard to the affirmations that I have spoken of, both by the House and by the large expression of public opinion in the sister country, I cannot, after mature consideration, see any sufficient reasons for a differential legislation, and, above all, in the city of Dublin, where, I believe, the evils against which this measure are directed exist in a very aggravated form."

I have read this evidence as showing the feelings of the learned Recorder on both sides of the question, and I think it would be unwise to endeavour to conceal from the House the evidence given by those who are friends of the Bill. Mr. Falkiner was further asked this question, and I think it advisable to direct the attention of the House to his answer—

"You have seen the Returns of the number of persons arrested in Dublin for Sunday drinking, and you have seen that there are less than on any other day to which the Returns relate?"

His answer was—

"I did not know that they were less than on any other day to which the Returns relate, taking Thursday and Saturday. There were 34 on the Thursday and 70 on the Saturday, as against 24 on the Sunday. That quite justifies your question."

He was then asked—

"Having regard to this Bill, which deals altogether with Sunday closing, which has no reference to any other days in the week, would you conceive that there is a reason for passing this measure as regards Sunday, because there is less drunkenness on Sunday than on any other day of the week?" "Not at all. I said that all through I was aware that a great deal less crime was brought before the magistrate on Monday morning, and that there was a good deal more from Saturday than there was from Sunday; and I said I would not have anything to do with the passing of this measure if it were not for social reasons, and I therefore declared that as I thought Sunday being the pleasure day, the holiday, and the wage-spending day to a large extent, there was much to be hoped for in the way of moral improvement, and I began by considering that this drunkenness, of which I speak, is not confined to Sunday at all."

That is evidence called on behalf of the promoters of the Bill.

"Would you conceive," he is asked, "having regard to the object of this Bill, which is confined to Sunday closing and to nothing else, that, there being less drunkenness on Sunday than on any other day of the week, therefore that the Bill should be passed?" "No, not at all. That is not the reason at all; it would be arithmetically absurd; but I laboured very hard indeed to show that that was not my opinion. I must say that in consequence of that possessing me, I never for one moment suggested any such arithmetical consideration, and stated all through that my reason for approving of Sunday closing, and for hoping for good from it, was the moral and social grounds arising from a variety of considerations, and I attempted to explain that this measure for Sunday is not applicable to Saturday."

I ask the House to consider whether the opinions thus given by a gentleman so strongly in favour of the Bill are such as would justify the House, in the face of admitted facts placed before them, to rush hurriedly into the enactment of this measure, which at best, according to the views of its own promoters, can be but an experiment, and whether the House ought not to pause in order to enable the country to form a rational, fair, and just opinion upon the evidence placed before them. Having now given the evidence of the Recorder, I will read very briefly an answer to a question that was asked of the divisional magistrate in Dublin, a gentleman who has had the most ample opportunities of forming a judgment on the question, and one whose opinion, if that of any official is to be taken to weigh at all, and to be gravely considered by the House, ought to be absolutely conclusive on the subject. Mr. O'Donnell said—

"I must say that after fully considering the question as carefully as I could, and from my experience as a magistrate for nearly 11 years, I am opposed to the total closing of public-houses on Sunday."

He was then asked to state to the Committee why he had formed that opinion. He said—

"It is a very large question, involving a great many views; but, of course, I shall endeavour to convey to you, as clearly and as briefly as I can, how it is I am influenced in coming to that conclusion. It is, as it were, a sort of jump in the dark, in trying a measure for the first time. None of us can see exactly how it will turn out. But I think it is very desirable, in looking at a question of this kind, to judge, as far as we can, of what may happen in the future from what has happened in the past, under a similar state of things. If you look at the city of Dublin on Sundays you will find that the law as it at present stands makes all licensed houses for the sale of drink to be absolutely closed for one-half of Sunday; and therefore, so far as the objects and designs of this Bill would go in a beneficial direction by closing for the remaining portion of Sunday, we may have some clue to guide us by noting how it acts for the first portion of the Sunday, in which legally all houses are closed at present. My experience as a magistrate is this—that during the first portion of the Sunday, in which no house can be legally opened until 2 o'clock in the afternoon, when public-houses are opened by law, there is as bad drinking, as much in extent and more deteriorating and demoralizing to the people, than the drinking that goes on afterwards. That has been clearly proved to us over and over again in the numerous cases that came at the licensing sessions before Mr. Woodlock and myself, at which the licensed spirit grocers and beer-dealers, wholesale and retail, applied for the renewal of their licences. Then it was for the first time that I really became aware of the enormous extent, and the deplorable extent, of illicit drinking in Dublin. It was proved before us in numerous cases, during the fortnight that we sat, in each of the two last years, for it took us that time sitting all day long to get through all the cases for each period, that in the low, squalid districts, where there are miles almost of poor, filthy streets, with lanes off them and courtways and alleys off those lanes again, there were known houses, known to the police also, carrying on illicit trade, where crowds of people congregated and got drink; but there was no getting legal evidence of the fact."

Mr. O'Donnell goes on to describe the impossibility of the police getting at the facts. He goes on to say—

“These facts come before me as a magistrate, and knowing those things, I ask myself what astonishing benefit will be served by closing public-houses and licensed-houses after 2 o'clock if we see that such are the results, so far, of closing before 2 o'clock?”

He says, further—

“What would take place in Dublin if, by the operation of this Act, if it passes, the public-houses were suddenly closed at 2 o'clock? I ask myself, who are the people who frequent the public-houses?”—this is important, as giving his opinion—“It is a very curious thing which has appeared in evidence with regard to illicit drinking before 2 o'clock that directly 2 o'clock arrived immediately the whole trade ceased, and of course the after-consumption in the city was expended in the public-house. But who are the people, then, that go to the public-house? Numbers upon numbers of people who frequent the public-houses have got moral restraint over themselves, and sense of decency and self-respect, and refrain from going to the illicit houses, to the beer-houses, and to low-class places of that kind. They wait till 2 o'clock comes, and then some of them go to the public-houses, and stay there perhaps for an hour or two hours. They go away, and others come in later on, and those are the class of people whom I look upon as the decenter class, as the more respectable and the humbler classes of Dublin, the working people and the tradespeople. Supposing, now, that you shut up the public-houses at 2 o'clock, what would become of those people? That is what I ask myself. Can I believe that, like good little boys at school, grown-up men, men with plenty of money in their pockets, after their hard week's work, and earning good wages, from 15s. to 20s., to £2 10s. and £3, and some of them more, if they have a desire for drink will refrain, because you pass an Act for shutting up those public-houses. If they can get it will they refrain from drinking? Then comes the question, if you shut up the public-houses by law, and the police are active in keeping them shut, can they prevent those people with money in their pockets from getting drunk in the city of Dublin? I say again that you cannot do it, and for this reason: Dublin is saturated with drink, it is flooded with drink, it is the staple manufacture. Every kind of drink which the people care to consume is manufactured in unlimited quantities in Dublin; every third or fourth house, even in respectable streets, deals in drink. The whiskey is excellent, and the porter ditto. Can you prevent that drink getting into the throat of a thirsty man with money in his pocket to pay for it, even if you shut up the public-houses? My impression is, that you cannot. Then what will those people do to get the drink, the public-houses being closed? Some will adopt the practice which they never adopted before; they will go to illicit houses, and drink beer and whiskey there, of very inferior quality, and those houses, by reason of the shutting up of the public-houses, will be greatly increased in number, and their trade will be increased in every squalid street in Dublin.”

I ask the House if it is possible to have evidence such as that, and for a moment to doubt the impropriety of this measure now sought to be hurried through the House, even without adequate investigation? I have confined myself to reading the evidence given in regard to Dublin; but the same class of evidence was given in reference to Cork, Belfast, Limerick, and Waterford, and the sample I have given with reference to Dublin is the same in reference to all the other towns. A great deal has been said about public opinion and the opinion of the Press. It is very true that a powerful organization which exists, with money and agents for the circulation of its views, has gained over some converts on the assumption that the question was one that required to be dealt with; but let me read an extract from a letter written by a most respectable magistrate of the county of Cork, who knows the country well, to a Cork newspaper. Mr. Payne, writing from Bantry, says—

“I have read your article of the 16th instant on this subject, and perhaps you will allow me, as a magistrate of 32 years' experience, to say that I fully agree with the opinions you have there expressed. In the district of this county with which I am connected as a magistrate we have an urban, a rural, and a seafaring population of over 30,000, and the number of prosecutions for drunkenness during the last 12 months was 311, which just amounts to this—that one person in every hundred got drunk once in the year. I do not suppose that the city of Cork and this district differ very materially in this respect from other parts of Ireland, and with these figures I cannot conceive how drunkenness can be called ‘the national sin,’ nor can I see the slightest necessity for what appears to me class legislation of the most trying and invidious nature. I believe the effect of it would be the very opposite to the expectations of its amiable promoters, that it would make ‘Ireland a land of shebeen houses,’ and cause the dangerous habit, at present happily so exceptional, of buying in supplies for drinking in private.”

I will also read an extract from a letter addressed on the 18th of this month to a Cork paper by a gentleman of the name of Costello. Mr. Costello I find is a licensed victualler, living in Queenstown, but he has not opened his house for 20 years on a Sunday, so that he can truly be regarded as suspicioni major on the subject. The Fleet was in Queenstown last week, and the whole country came down to look at it. Sunday was the great gala day, and Mr. Costello says—

"Vast numbers came by the excursion trains from Limerick, Waterford, Fermoy, Killarney, Macroom, Kinsale, and Youghal to avail themselves of that rare treat of inspecting those magnificent vessels of the Channel Squadron, but particularly the Thunderer, which was besieged by an admiring crowd of not less than 20,000 persons, besides the vast numbers that proceeded in the river and railway steamers to visit the other vessels of the squadron in the harbour: permit me to say a few words. It was computed by many that there must have been no less than 70,000 souls in Queenstown yesterday, and in no single instance has it been known that the interference of the Constabulary was required. When I dwell on the fact that at the hour of 4 o'clock no ale or porter, lemonade, ginger-beer, or other similar drink could be had in any of the public-houses that were open, and that during those hours vast crowds of all classes, including men-of-war's men, met in those houses, and nothing but social harmony and the most kindly feelings prevailed, I now question any of the pleaders for Sunday closing, if the measure were in force in Ireland, would Queenstown be so peaceable and orderly as it was on this occasion, when blue-jackets, civilians, and marines were in close communication in all parts of the town? If the sale of drink on Sunday had not been in existence here, it is obvious to any rational person what the issue would have been; and as long as railway companies continue to give excursions of this kind on the different railways of the country the total closing of public-houses would be attended with disorder, confusion, and perhaps insubordination against authority. There is no denying that this state of society in Queenstown on Sunday was due in a great measure to the exemplary conduct of the men from each of Her Majesty's vessels. Not only was their general conduct such as to speak volumes for the discipline of the men on board of those vessels; but the humane and kind attention bestowed on the vast numbers that were privileged to visit the Thunderer was the general topic of conversation by all on reaching the landing on shore. From all were eulogiums conferred on the officers aboard the turret ship, from the commander, Lord Charles Beresford, to the apprentice sailor boy; many were the good wishes given them, which they all in general well deserve, on their departure from our noble harbour."

This letter speaks the sentiments of every individual of the slightest thought, and is, therefore, of peculiar value. I thank the House for its indulgence. There are other topics which I might dwell upon, but as other hon. Members have to come after me I will refrain. When the facts go forth to the country which I have brought before the House, and men have time calmly to consider the subject, then even as regards those who may be inclined to lend themselves to the philanthropic and humanitarian views of the subject, I believe that, so far from lending themselves to the support of this legislation, they will strongly oppose a measure which, although introduced in good faith, is but at the best a makeshift, and would be oppressive in its operation. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment.

MR. M. BROOKS, in seconding the Amendment, said, it was his duty to inform the House, as one of the Representatives of the metropolitan City of Ireland, that the people of Dublin had no desire for the provisions of this Bill to be extended to that City. In corroboration of that statement, it would be his duty to give the House a few of the reasons which, in his opinion, justified him in making it, and the first of which was, that the learned Recorder of Dublin, in a recent Charge, had truly observed that it was preposterous to think that society could be regenerated by Sunday closing, or by the refusal of spirit licences, if nothing else was done. On the back of the Bill he found the name of the hon. Member for Londonderry, (Mr. Richard Smyth) who voted against the Bill for opening Museums and Art Galleries on Sundays. The hon. Member for Derry (Mr. Charles Lewis) and the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. J. Corry) who voted against that measure, had also backed the present Bill. He also found the name of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) on the back of the Bill, and he had also voted against the opening of the Museums and Art Galleries on Sundays. He (Mr. Brooks) contended that a proposal which had been supported by all those hon. Gentlemen who were members of the Presbyterian Church, and which would be all very well for the Presbyterians in the North of Ireland, ought not to be extended to the population of the South of Ireland, as it did not accord with the desires and instincts of the people of the Southern districts. The learned Recorder of Dublin had said in his evidence before the Committee, that he would not vote for any measure which was simply one of repression, and which did not provide for the people some substitute for the public-houses. He had further said, in regard to the Bill, that he did not know that any other certain result would follow its operation, except that illicit drinking would be increased in the City of Dublin. Well, he thought these were reasons why Dublin should be exempted from the operation of the Bill; but he thought there were other reasons connected with Dublin being the metropolitan City which did not prevail with regard to Wexford or the diocese of Dublin. Like London, with its Brighton, Richmond, Greenwich, &c., Dublin had its suburban places of resort, and amongst them Kingstown and Bray; but, if this Bill passed into law, the visitors to those places would be unreasonably deprived of those advantages, as respected refreshments, which were enjoyed by the people of other cities of which he had knowledge, such as Paris. Dublin had, moreover, large classes of operatives, and it was a garrison town, and a seaport; and if this Bill passed, large bodies of soldiers, sailors, and railway porters, &c., would be deprived of the opportunity of obtaining reasonable and moderate refreshment on Sundays. If public opinion in Dublin had declared in favour of closing the public-houses on Sundays, the clergy and the inhabitants would, as in other towns, have invited the licensed victuallers to abstain from the sale of intoxicating liquors. Had they done so, he believed that the influence of the clergy was so great in Ireland that the necessary reforms could be carried out by that means without any enactment of this kind. He must again say that, as one of the Members for the City of Dublin, he could assert with confidence that the 40,000 working men of the City were opposed to the Bill, which would be a stigma upon their character and their reputation. Whilst, undoubtedly, there might be in Dublin some few habitual drunkards, the wishes of the 40,000 men ought to prevail over the wishes of those who did not use public-houses, and who endeavoured to suppress drunkenness by this coercive measure.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is not expedient that the provisions of this Bill should be extended to the whole of Ireland,"—(Mr. Murphy,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. ROEBUCK said, he was anxious to say a few words on the subject. He had felt very strongly on the question

during the whole of his career; and now, at the close of that career, he wished for the first time to state the opinion he had held as well at the commencement, as now at the close. The Bill was an exceptional one, and for an exceptional Bill there were required reasons to justify that exception. What was the measure? It was an attempt to infringe the liberty of every private man to do as he pleased with respect to his drinking, by saying that on a particular day he should be shut out from the ordinary means of obtaining refreshment to assuage the necessities of nature, because, by that means, intemperance would be prevented on the part of others. But they must prove that the mischief existed, and that the mode of remedy suggested would be effectual. Now, until the present Bill was introduced he had believed that the people of Ireland—at least the great majority—really desired it; and, because he so believed, he had voted with the Government for bringing the question on for discussion to-day. He had, however, heard a speech that day, which had entirely disabused him of that idea, not only in regard to the feelings of the people of Ireland, but also as to the facts of the present case. He had been told that the great body of the people of Ireland with regard to this matter desired a Bill of Coercion, and he had also been told, and believed, that Sunday drinking was peculiar in this respect—that Sunday was the day on which people generally got drunk, and when they presented a spectacle of intemperance far worse than was to be found elsewhere. Exceptional legislation was therefore demanded, as he had thought, because of the great excesses which occurred on that day. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Murphy) had, however, shown, in the first place, that there was not that general demand for the Bill which had been represented, and, in the next place, that Sunday, so far from being the exceptional day of intemperance, was the exceptional day of temperance in Ireland. Now, this was a sumptuary law to guide the people in their private habits, but where was this kind of legislation to stop? It was all very well to say that this was a great evil to be dealt with. No one was more convinced than himself of the mischiefs of intemperance; no one derided it more than he did the excess of intemperance in this country; but to say that such an evil existed was not to show him that the remedy propounded by this Bill would be effectual. What would be the result if this Bill became law? Would anyone be prepared to say that it would in any way diminish drunkenness? This was a question of importance, and one that ought to be satisfactorily answered. Did anyone mean to say that by shutting up the public-houses on Sunday in Ireland the people would become more temperate? He asserted that they would not. The House knew what the consequence would be. A man who wanted drink, and who had money in his pocket, would always be able to get it. Let the House make laws of the most restrictive character, and put a policeman in every street, and yet if people who had the means wanted to get drunk, they would do so. It was not at that end of the scale that Parliament could put down drunkenness. It was not by restrictive legislation that drunkenness was to be checked; but by education, and, more than that, by allowing the people on Sunday to have rational amusement and innocent means of recreation by the opening of Museums and Galleries. Those persons who opposed in every possible way the opening of Museums—the opening of modes of really innocent and rational amusement, had done more to promote drunkenness than all the licensed victuallers in the Kingdom; nay, they must provide for the people of the country the mode of passing their days and hours of leisure in a rational and innocent manner, and afford them the means of enjoying themselves in the bosom of their families, and of getting to places where they could derive amusement from the treasures of art and science, and they would be doing their duty; but they would not be doing their duty by making restrictive laws against keeping open public-houses on Sundays, and, at the same time, keeping our Galleries and Museums closed. By so doing, the House would only open 10,000 shebeen houses. For every public-house that would be shut up, depend upon it 10 or 20 of these wretched hovels would be opened. A man who now wanted refreshment went honestly and fairly into a public-house, and did not feel that he degraded himself; but if the Bill passed, the same man would skulk into a shebeen house in order to avoid publicity, and men would be committing a crime in their hearts when they were now only doing what was innocent and proper in itself. He felt deeply on the subject, and if the House of Commons sanctioned these restrictive rules, it would only be offering a premium upon bigotry and intolerance.

Mr. BRUEN said, he would support the Bill, although he candidly admitted that, seeing the influential minority opposed to it, he was inclined to pause before giving his assent to all its provisions. The constituencies of Ireland, except those of five large towns, had shown that they were practically in favour of the Bill; but as to those five large towns, no one could deny that a very considerable, respectable, and sober minority were opposed to the application of some of the principles of this measure. The question then arose whether, if the public-houses were closed on Sundays against the will of the people, drinking would be stopped. He did not believe that it would. Another question was how Parliament could refuse to adopt the same principle in England when it had been put in force in Ireland? If such a Bill were proposed for England, he should oppose it, because a very large number of the working classes would be coerced by it against their will. In the case of the Bill under notice, he was himself opposed to coercing the minority; but he could not support the Amendment, because, while he would not force the measure on those parts of Ireland where there was no general feeling in its favour, yet he desired to see it put in force where there was such general feeling in its favour. To pass the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Murphy), would be to defeat the Bill, and prevent its application to those parts of the country where it could be applied safely and beneficially, and he thought the object of the Amendment, with which he so far sympathized, could be sufficiently met by Amendments on the clauses of the Bill in Committee, such as those of which the Chief Secretary for Ireland had given Notice. He should, therefore, vote against the Amendment, reserving to himself the right of voting in Committee for the exemption of certain parts of Ireland from the operation of the Bill where he thought it might be done without injury to the morality of the people. He believed that the Act would work beneficially where the majority of the people were in favour of it, but that its results would not be so satisfactory when any large proportion of the working classes was opposed to it.

MR. R. POWER: Sir, one effect of the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for the city of Cork (Mr. Murphy) has been to drive from the House all the advocates of the Bill. No doubt, they will return by-and-bye and say that they were not at all convinced by the arguments of my hon. Friend. As I have always voted against the measure, and have never trespassed on the patience of the House to give my reasons for doing so, I hope I may now be allowed to say why I object to the Bill of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry. In opposing this Motion I am no advocate of intemperance on a Sunday or a week-day, for I believe it to be the greatest social curse of any country; but I am firmly convinced that the Bill now before us, if carried out, will produce a very different result from that which its promoters anticipate. Instead of checking it will give a fresh impetus and zest to the vice of drunkenness—a vice which proves that in one respect, at least, the brute creation can rise superior to man. This Bill, in effect, proposes to establish one law for England and another law for Ireland—at least, for the present, for if my hon. Friend extended the provisions of his Bill to this country, I should like to know how many English Members would follow him into the Lobby; but he is too good a tactician to propose anything like this. He knows very well that the generosity of his English Friends would only follow him to Ireland, and that they dare not do in their own country what they propose to do at the other side of the Channel. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Richard Smyth) has consulted the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson)—for these temperance agitators play into the hands of one another—and they have agreed that the Irish Sunday Closing Bill is the thin end of a very thick wedge. I believe that Sunday closing will give a zest to Sunday drinking, for it is human nature to value that which is most difficult to obtain. Forbidden fruit is always the sweetest. Even liberty is sweeter to a nation that has been deprived of it. At College I used to smoke because it was not allowed. Now, I seldom smoke at all; and we all know that a certain French lady once said—"What a delicious thing a glass of cold water would be if it were only a sin;" and so a glass of beer on a Sunday will be a most delicious thing when your Bill becomes law. Hon. Members say that as the Irish people are almost unanimously in favour of this Bill, and as it does not effect the integrity of the Empire, they will vote for it. I deny both these propositions. The Irish people are not in favour of the measure, as I shall presently prove, and no measure of importance has ever passed this House which does not work directly or indirectly, for the good or evil of this country. Now, let us see what they mean by saying that the people of Ireland are in favour of this coercive measure. This agitation has been going on for years, supported by a powerful and wealthy organization, sparing no money or pains to influence opinion in their favour—Petitions, meetings, threatening speeches—and yet upon the last occasion they could only get 49 Irish Members out of 103 to record their votes in favour of this Bill. But I do not rely on this fact alone to dispel the popular error that unanimity exists in Ireland upon this question. I will take the card supplied by those temperance reformers to hon. Members of this House. It is headed—

"Memorial in favour of Sunday Closing. Abstract of signatures:—Clergy—Protestant Episcopalian, 1,119, out of 2,221; Roman Catholic, 864, out of 3,136; Presbyterian, 342, out of 679; physicians, surgeons, &c., 744, out of 2,420; merchants and employers of labour, &c., 453, out of 726,636."

Do these figures prove that the people of Ireland are in favour of this Bill? Then, again, when I look to my own constituents, I can confidently state that a majority of them are not in favour of the Bill. At the last Election no fewer than 13 candidates endeavoured to get in for Waterford, and of these five went to the poll. Of the five, three pledged themselves in favour of the Sunday Closing Bill. The League made the fact known far and wide, adding an expression of their regret that Mr. Power and Major O'Gorman were opposed to the Bill. What was the result of the election? Why, that the two candidates who were opposed to the Bill were returned at the head of the poll. In one of the many pamphlets which have been issued by those who seek to have the Bill passed, it is stated that there are only two ways of making men sober: one is to get them to abstain altogether—the course which they, of course, advocate; the other is to educate them to drink; and it is sought to be shown by statistics, and particularly by the number of convictions for drunkenness in one year as compared with another that, while in the former year of the two—1864—it took 50 gallons of whiskey to make a man drunk, in the latter—1874—it took 60 gallons to make a man drunk, he had become so acclimatized. The effect of closing has been tried once in Waterford. At the request of the Bishop of Waterford the public-houses were closed on the 24th and 25th of December; but on the 26th no fewer than 35 cases of drunkenness were brought before the magistrates; and a greater number of arrests would have been made, but that the lock-up was so full that there was no use in taking up any more drunkards, and, as it was Christmas time, many cases were overlooked which would otherwise have been dealt with. But it is said that the clergy are in favour of the Bill. I believe they will be found to concur in the opinion expressed by one of their Bishops, to the effect that—"Coercive means can never cure; the will and the mind must be acted upon." Lord Emly stated the other day, that the experiment of Sunday closing had been tried in a portion of the diocese of Limerick, and that it had been found that where Sunday closing was carried out, 1 in 212 was found to be drunk; while, where it was not, the proportion was 1 in 332. Now, Scotland has been held up as an example of how well the Act works, but what are the facts as shown by reliable statistics? It is stated that while virtuous Scotland distils 17 odd million gallons of whiskey in the year, drunken Ireland distils 10,000,000 only; that Scotland consumes 6,872,000 gallons, while Ireland, with her greater population, consumes 6,490,000 gallons. In the words of one of the Scotch Inspectors General, writing a Report on the subject of drunkenness in that country, "Scotland is drinking herself to death." In Glasgow alone there are no fewer than 1,856 houses in which whiskey is sold, besides ale and beer-houses. That is the evidence in reference to Scotland. With respect to the Bill, I maintain that this is not the time to propose that public-houses should be closed in Ireland upon Sunday. Temperance reformers are in advance of public opinion, and no measure has ever been carried in this House until public opinion preceded it. Let them wait until places of recreation and innocent amusement are open for the working man. Museums and picture galleries may wean the mind from the gin-shop and elevate the moral tone of a people; but you cannot by mere Act of Parliament teach that self-respect and sobriety which are so necessary for the welfare of a nation. You must give the working man some rational enjoyment on the Sunday, for idleness is the parent of intemperance. It has been said that the love of opposition is a predominant feature in the Irish character, and I have heard several facts quoted in confirmation of that opinion. For instance, Bianconi, who was the first to introduce into Ireland that elegant and useful article called an Irish jaunting-car, and who realized a large fortune by running those cars between different towns in Ireland, once told me that when he started his first car in the county Galway, he could get no passengers. No one would travel on his car, although he offered every inducement, and he was about giving up the business. But being a close observer of human nature, he got an insight, although an Italian, into the Irish character, and he started an opposition car under a fictitious name. From that moment, his cars began to fill, and for ever after he had plenty of passengers. Now, if this trait is so strong in the Irish character, I would seriously ask is there not some danger in carrying a Bill opposed to their wishes and feelings? Even in this House I must admit the national failing is conspicuous, for Irish Members of Parliament are generally in Opposition; but here the national trait is rather a virtue than a fault; for a strong Opposition is almost as necessary to the good government of a country as a strong Government. The only difference I can see between Her Majesty's Government and Her Majesty's Opposition is, that the latter work for their country without pay, or, as we say in Ireland, for the "honour and glory of the thing." In saying this, I believe I am giving Her Majesty's Opposition more honour than they deserve, for, at all events, they have the prospect of pay—although I fear just now the prospect is rather distant; and I doubt if Her Majesty's Opposition fully appreciate the sentiment "that distance lends enchantment to the view." Because a few drink too much you would prevent the many from drinking at all. That is, the principle of your Bill extends that principle to the other relations of social life; and into what labyrinths of coercion and confusion will it not lead you? Why, anything taken in excess is bad. Tobacco is as injurious as whiskey. Why not protect the British subject from its evil influences? I wonder if the advocates of this Bill ever drink a glass of beer themselves on Sunday? Are there no thirsty souls amongst them? The hon. Member for Londonderry has not told the House whether he has given up his glass of sherry on a Sunday, or whether he indulges in anything stronger than sweet lemonade or explosive soda water. Of course we are bound to presume that the hon. Member and all hon. Members who support him practice what they preach. Perhaps the hon. Member's great zeal in this cause originates in that failing of human nature—

"To compound for sins we are inclined to,
By damning those we have a mind to."

The over-zeal of an advocate often does more injury to his cause than all the arguments of his opponents. The effect of the proposed law would be to create a re-action in favour of Sunday drinking. But we shall have to contend with a perverse principle of human nature, which is always prone to run into extremes. If you close up the public-house altogether on Sunday and prohibit a man from drinking moderately, he will, in all probability, if he gets the opportunity, drink to excess. I will quote for the House just one case as an illustration of this principle. A respectable farmer, and a most sober man, was going to a fair to sell his pig. He asked his wife for a shilling, for she kept the key of the till, as all wives ought to do—when they can. Well, he asked his wife for a shilling to get a glass of beer. "No," says she, "I'll do no such thing; be off and sell my pig." "Well," says he, "if you don't give me a shilling to get a glass or two of beer, I'll drink the pig." Well, he did go off, and he kept his word. He drank the pig, and came home to his wife very drunk indeed, and without a shilling in his pocket; and you may imagine, if you can, the kind of interview that took place between them on his arrival. Now this man was never known by any of his neighbours to be drunk before. Therefore, I contend that if you prohibit the working man from taking his glass of beer on a Sunday, you are following the example of the farmer's wife. You will drive the working man to imitate the countryman who drank his pig. You may depend that you cannot make a people sober by any Act of Parliament. Your only remedy is education, but it must be education with religion. Education alone will not teach the enormity of the sin of intemperance. Religion alone can instil into the young mind that horror of the vice of drunkenness which, in after life, will be the best safeguard against the public-house. This is a case which proves that religion without education is better for a people than education without religion; while both combined is the perfection of human government. Civil and religious liberty is of little value to a country without civil and religious education. Let temperance orators advocate a system of education based upon religion, and they will do more to promote the sobriety of the people than all the arguments which have ever been advanced by melancholy Sabbatarians and bilious Teetotalers. Parliament can do great things. You can establish a Church by Act of Parliament, and disestablish it, too, as you have lately done. You can found a Constitution by Act of Parliament, or suspend a Constitution—as the Irish people know. You can make an Empress by Act of Parliament—as all the world knows. Many and strange are the things you can do and have done by Act of Parliament; but legislation steps beyond its precincts when it seeks to establish sobriety by unequal and coercive laws. I have never given to my constituents a promise upon this question. I am not bound to vote one way or another. I am not, as others may be, overloaded with electioneering pledges; but I oppose this Bill, because I believe it to be contrary to the rules of free government, vicious in principle, and tyrannical in practice.

Mr. R. Power

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that when he came down to the House he did not intend to speak; but he felt bound to make a few remarks after listening to the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Murphy), which was in a great part a repetition of the unjustifiable attack upon the organization from which the Bill emanated. The hon. Member, however, admitted that that organization was actuated by benevolent motives, which was more than could be said for those whom the hon. Member represented. He regretted that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) had followed, not very successfully, in the same line; nor was he very happy in his references to the fate which three supporters of the measure had met at the hands of the electors of Waterford. For although it was true that they had been rejected by the borough of Waterford, one of them had since been, in the face of the most active opposition, returned by a much greater constituency—namely, that of the county of Waterford. A great deal had been said as to the opinion of the people of Ireland in reference to the measure, and as it was desirable there should be no mistake upon the point, he regretted that the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) should have come to the conclusion that the majority of the people were opposed to it, and have changed his opinion of the measure in consequence. For his part, he (Mr. O'Connor Power) could say that, representing one of the largest counties in Ireland—Mayo—his hands had been filled with Petitions in favour of the Bill, while not one single individual in the county had expressed a desire that he should oppose it. On the other hand, many of them, including Catholic Bishops and clergymen, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and others, had urged upon him, as he valued the welfare of the country, to do all he could to remove a great temptation from the people. They all desired, he had no doubt, to put down drunkenness, but he could not but express his belief that the opposition to the measure was based to a great extent on interested motives. ["Oh, oh!"] He did not say that of his Colleagues in that House—they were all honourable men—but transferred the charge to the organization of licensed victuallers throughout the Kingdom who, it was well known, at the last Election had intimidated the Conservative Government on the subject. On the other hand, it was clear that if the officers of the Sunday Closing movement were actuated by such motives, they were taking the worst mode to defeat their objects, because the moment the Bill passed their occupation would be gone. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had asked whether anyone believed that the passing of the Bill would diminish drunkenness? Well, he (Mr. O'Connor Power) believed that it would not, perhaps, immediately; but that, on the contrary, the arbitrary repression of a desire shared by a large number might increase that desire, but that would not last long. The hiding away of temptations and allurements might not have the effect immediately upon the old and hardened which they all desired, but it assuredly would upon the young. The rising generation, at all events, would not be drawn into public-houses, or on Sundays, into shebeens, as those who preceded them had been. That it would do so had been proved by the experience of the diocese of Galway and Emly, in which Sunday closing had been voluntarily adopted. He knew that in America, even in the States where the Maine Liquor Law prevailed, there was Sunday drinking, but it was confined to middle-aged men and women, those who had brought with them, with their European prejudices, European vices to America, and among them were not to be found any young men from 18 to 25 years of age. It was true also that the Maine Liquor Law had in some cases been repealed; but that had been accounted for by Professor Wendell Phillips, a champion of the masses of the people, who said, in a recent speech delivered at Boston, that it arose from the fact that since the American War the country was controlled by the large cities, and the large cities by their criminal population. His own county of Mayo was, as far as he knew, unanimously in favour of the Bill. His hon. Friend the Member for Cork City had quoted figures to show that there was less drinking on Sunday than on any other day. But if people did not drink so much on Sunday as on other days, it was because their facilities for drinking on that day had already been restricted. He said, therefore, increase those restrictions and you will further diminish drunkenness. Then the hon. Member asked whether they desired to prevent the peasantry meeting on Sunday, the only day on which they could meet. By no means. Let them meet by all means, but not in public-houses. His hon. Friend had also said this Bill was based upon Sabbatarianism, and he (Mr. O'Connor Power) had no objection to base his support of the Bill on that ground; but his Sabbatarianism was similar to that of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, who would open the Museums and other educational institutions on the Sabbath to the people rather than allow them to have free access to the public-houses. His hon. Friend the Member for Cork had ridiculed the idea of proposing a measure of this kind in the name of patriotism; but he (Mr. O'Connor Power) would not hesitate to support it on that ground. In the proportion in which the people were addicted to this vice, the arm of popular freedom was paralyzed; and if they were to have a free Irish people they must have a sober Irish people—and if they could not make them sober by suasion, he was prepared to remove the drink from them. If he had spoken somewhat warmly, it was because he felt strongly, and he had never before trespassed upon the House with regard to this subject. He would conclude with a brief reference to the last argument of the Member for Cork. The hon. Member referred in glowing terms to the reception of the Fleet at Queenstown, and talked about the 70,000 or 80,000 people who went there, remarking how sober the people were; but the fact was that the demand on the public-houses was so great that all the drink was exhausted. There was not a glass of ale or porter to be got, for the peasantry took Queenstown by storm.

MR. MURPHY, rising to Order, said, he referred to the large consumption of ginger-beer, soda-water, and other non-intoxicating drinks, and not to that of alcoholic beverages.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said he was glad to hear and to accept the explanation. It appeared, then, that the 70,000 or 80,000 people there on that occasion so far sympathized with the Irish Sunday Closing Association as to prefer ginger-beer and soda-water to porter. He was glad that the hon. Member for Cork thought it necessary to rise and interrupt him for the purpose of showing that the people of Ireland did not want ale and porter, and that they could be perfectly satisfied with temperance drinks.

THE O'DONOGHUE: I think, Sir, that very many interesting speeches have been addressed to you to-day, and prominently amongst them that of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck); and I am sure I may venture to give expression to what I believe to be the feeling of the House, that that hon. and learned Member may long be amongst us to impart to our deliberations a share of that public spirit for which he has been conspicuous throughout his career, and to charm us by his eloquence. My hon. Friends who have spoken on this side have scarcely left me anything to say; and the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen), who spoke on the other side, seemed to have so much difficulty in making up his mind, that he has relieved me from any attempt at that most difficult of Parliamentary performances—a reply. I believe it is generally supposed that the promoters of this Bill are good men, with the very best intentions. I, for one, accept the supposition. Indeed, the nearest approach to a charge that I have ever heard brought against any of them is that some of them are rather too good—that their goodness is somewhat repulsive from being too demonstrative; that it is a phase of that Puritanism which thinks it necessary to close Museums and Picture Galleries to the people on Sundays, and assume a dejected look and a nasal twang on the Lord's Day. The promoters of this Bill propose to enact that henceforth on Sunday in Ireland, no farmer, no labourer in town or country, no artizan—no man, in short, who is not rich enough to keep either a well-stocked cellar or cupboard—shall be permitted to moisten his lips with what is understood by the term drink. That is to say, that, taking the population of Ireland at about 5,500,000, very little short of 5,000,000 are to be compelled to abstain for ever on Sundays from the use of alcohol. The advocates of the Bill, in fact, seek to amend the Commandment which declares that one day in the week shall be set apart as a day of rest, by the addition of a penal clause that it shall also be a day of unassuaged thirst; and the peculiarity of this latest addition to the Decalogue is, that it will only affect that unfortunately too large section of our community who are so poor as to be unable to make a provision against this gust of fanaticism. Why, as compared with the consequences of this Bill, the consequences of the Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfred Lawson) will be as a mere nothing, because all that one would have to do to escape from the consequences of that Bill would be to slip round into the next parish in order to procure what one wanted. But this Bill is in direct violation of the principle of the Bill of the hon. Member for Carlisle—a falsification of the professions by which the advocates of that measure have been able to obtain even a hearing for it in this House and the country. We are constantly being told that everything is to be left to the people; that periodically in each district a great cry is to be raised of grog or no grog, and that this momentous issue is to be left to a free population. Then, we are told, if the grogites have it, they will practically be able to lush in ease at home; and if they are so unfortunate as to lose the day, all that will happen will be that they will have to imbibe after they have had to endure nothing worse than a short stroll and an agreeable jaunt. Now, we see the real animus of these voluntaries, and can form some idea of the lengths to which they are anxious to go if they had the power. These advocates of the Permissive Bill are swarming around the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Richard Smyth) and the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), to assist them in stamping upon the Statute Book a Bill which seeks to accomplish, in a modified degree, the same objections as the Permissive Bill, which has its origin in the same spirit of quackery, and as much finality as can be pressed upon any act of man. There cannot be a doubt that this Bill is being pushed on by a party of monomaniacs. The hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), who has just addressed the House, has adverted to the use of strong language. I admit that this is just one of those questions where the use of particular language may be said to be exclusively a matter of taste. But I must be again permitted to say that those who are pushing on this Bill are a party of monomaniacs. Many of them certainly, influenced by a high religious enthusiasm, are convinced that the Devil is the suggestor, if not the inventor, of fermentation, quite forgetting who it was that changed the water into wine at the marriage feast. There is, again, without being at all exercised by religion, a large number of persons who consider total abstention from alcohol an infallible preservative against rheumatism, chilblains, gout, and all the ills which flesh is heir to. Not a few of them are converted toppers, filled with all the furious zeal of neophytes; and some of them, owing to some defects in their private cellular departments, reject everything spirituous, as the doctors would say, "by the spontaneous action of nature." It will not be denied that they are a select party. I am far from saying that they are not actuated by kindly feelings towards mankind; but this I may say—that their advances are not at all reciprocated; that they are separated more effectually by their eccentricities from the rest of mankind than any artificial barrier could separate them; and that they are the very last men that ought to be allowed to legislate for that great aggregate of ordinary mortals who constitute the majority of the world. But, Sir, I should not be the least afraid of their being allowed to legislate if the drumming of the hon. and learned Member for Louth had not brought the swarm to fasten upon Ireland, the subject and victim of so many experiments. The majority of the Irish Members have voted in favour of this measure, and from that it might be inferred that a majority of the Irish people are in favour of it, and that its advocates would not avowedly press it forward in opposition to the wish of the people. Assuming it to be true that a majority of the Irish people are in favour of this measure, one thing at all events is clear, that in this respect they differ from all the people on the Continent of Europe, from the vast majority on the Continent of America, from the people of England; and when we search the Universe to find another nation which agrees with the Irish in desiring to put it out of its power to take a drink on Sundays, we have to turn to the North of this Island, to the people of Scotland. Beyond all question that is a curious and extraordinary statement; one of those things which show that if miracles have ceased, wonders have certainly not. If drunkenness has ceased in Scotland, why have you not long since applied the same measure to this country? Here are two nations of whom it is said by the advocates of the Permissive Bill that they are the greatest drunkards in the world, and whose partiality for drink is said to be notorious, and yet these are the only two nations in the world who, according to the advocates of this Bill, are actually clamouring that they should be prevented from indulging in intemperance, and that, too, on the only one day in the week on which they can enjoy themselves, and further insisting that the least infringement of that restraint shall render them amenable to prosecution, and subject them to severe penalties. We protest, Sir, against this charge of want of self-restraint which has been brought against us by the advocates of Sunday closing. The people of Ireland are renowned for being most convivial and most hospitable; but I entirely deny that they are in favour of Sunday closing. I would ask those who point their to majorities among the Irish Members, if the majority of Irish Members always represented the views of the majorities of the Irish people who are their constituents? There was a time when the majority of Irish Members would exclude Roman Catholics from a seat in this House and from any share of power in our municipal corporations. It is not a very long time since the majority of the Irish Members favoured the maintenance of the Irish Church, and scouted the idea of any improvement in the relations between landlord and tenant. I do not say that the majority of to-day is not a better representative of the feelings and wishes of the people than were the majorities of the times to which I have alluded; but I do tell them they are now taking the same course which was taken by those majorities of former days in acting without consulting their constituencies and in utter ignorance of what are their real feelings. I do not mean to say that the majority of to-day would act in defiance of the wishes of the majority of the people. The consideration of the question never came before them, and it never entered into their heads that they were to be compelled to become teetotallers on Sunday. The question is one which has only in a few instances entered into the addresses which the candidates for Parliamentary election have made to their constituents. Only two or three of them have at all alluded to the subject, and these have been the noble Lord the Member for Enniskillen (Viscount Oricton), the hon. Member for the county of Londonderry, and the hon. and learned Member for Louth. I chanced to see a report of the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech, and I just threw my eye over it to see what he was after. The hon. and learned Gentleman is the leader of the teetotal party in Ireland, and therefore it is of no small importance that I should mention to the House what he said to his constituents. I have not the report by me, and, therefore, I can only paraphrase his remarks from memory. He first announced to them as a piece of information that an ante-Saxon feeling still fired his breast; and then he avowed that his prospects of eternal salvation were mixed up with the settlement of this momentous question.

MR. SULLIVAN rose to Order, and asked the hon. Member what report of his speech he was quoting from, as he did not recollect having used the words which the hon. Gentleman had repeated. He was not in the habit of repudiating speeches, the proofs of which he had himself corrected.

THE O'DONOGHUE: I am referring to the report which appeared in The Freeman's Journal, and I deem it an extraordinary circumstance that on this occasion my memory is better than that of the hon. and learned Gentleman's.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER rose to Order. He did not gather from what the hon. Member for Tralee had just said that he mentioned the date of The Freeman's Journal in which he had found the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Louth. It was desirable that he should do so, as then hon. Members would be able to consult it.

MR. SPEAKER: That is not a question of Order. The hon. Member for Tralee prefaced his remarks by saying that he quoted from memory, and it is competent for the hon. and learned Member for Louth to contradict the hon. Member for Tralee if he should present him.

THE O'DONOGHUE: The hon. and learned Gentleman then went on to say that he could not at the last day appear before his Maker in the valley of Jehoshaphat with any conscience unless he had previously put a padlock upon all the public-houses on Sunday.

MR. SULLIVAN would be glad, at any rate, if the hon. Gentleman would quote his words correctly, for he would give the fullest contradiction to what he now said.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member for Tralee was in possession of the House, and at the end of his speech full opportunity would be given to any hon. Member who wished to correct him in what he had said.

THE O'DONOGHUE: It is, Sir, indeed, very difficult to go on; but what followed was that the hon. and learned Gentleman wished to see the decanter and porter-jug replaced by the teapot, and it was to his effecting the fulfilment of this that he looked forward to his being recognized in that multitudinous assembly of many nations. That was positively the substance of what the hon. and learned Gentleman had to say to his constituents, although I admit it is but an humble imitation of the grandeur of his style. The noble Lord the Member for Enniskillen has also addressed his constituents, and he told them to return him again to Parliament in order that an exponent of teetotalism should have a place on the Treasury Bench. Well, he has been returned, but he observes a masterly silence on the subject. The hon. Member for Londonderry has undoubtedly introduced the subject in two or three meetings in the North of Ireland; but it should be noticed that he addressed the same meeting two or three times, and the few meetings which had been held elsewhere certainly cannot be relied upon to show that unanimity in favour of the Bill which it is pretended by the supporters of this measure prevails in Ireland. I feel I am perfectly justified in asserting that there has been no interchange of opinion at all in Ireland on this question; and I say it is a misrepresentation to tell the House of Commons that there is but one opinion in Ireland in favour of this Sunday closing. But there are circumstances which have given to this Bill an importance which intrinsically it does not possess. Many leaders of public opinion, and notably the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) and Birmingham (Mr. Bright), the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, and many others having observed that the majority of Irish Members are in favour of the Bill, have come to the conclusion that they expressed the opinion of the Irish people, and that such opinion should not be resisted, however much the House might dislike this Bill. I rejoice that this has been the means of eliciting from statesmen of such high authority the annunciation of a principle so indicative of an auspicious dawn on Irish politics. Those who have taken the trouble to take note of my humble career in this House will acknowledge that I have urged it over and over again in respect to the settlement of the Land Question and of the question of Education. These are questions to a well-defined settlement of which many Irish Members stand pledged, and in support of which there have been numerous public meetings held in every part of Ireland. I recollect that upon one occasion the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich entered into an argument with me, that I could not apply this general principle to the settlement of the question of Education. Well, I do not know how it is that this question has brought conviction to so many minds, although I confess it is little complimentary to the intelligence of my fellow-countrymen, as showing that in the opinion of those statesmen the only thing with which they can be entrusted is the management of their own public-houses. The recognition of the principle now will be new and surprising to the Irish people, and I appeal to the House not to signalize this new departure by a course very much like a practical joke, and give to Ireland what she does not want at all. If there has been no expression of opinion heard from the Irish people, it is because nothing has been more constantly impressed upon them, than that such expressions of opinion are of no avail. The first article of their creed is want of faith in this House; but now that this want of faith is about to be removed, you may be sure that they will speak out once again with redoubled force upon many a question, and unmistakably upon this question, when the proper time arrives. They will tell you they look upon this Bill as one calculated to change their day of rest into a dismal Sunday; that it is designed to deprive the working population of the great towns, the cities, and villages of Ireland of the enjoyment which the sea coasts, the lakes, and the mountain scenery afford. Every man will feel that if he leaves his home he cannot be provided with refreshment; that he must stand about all day, rain or no rain, and remain upon his feet, because every place of shelter or rest will be closed against him. If any place of refreshment were opened to him the police would insist on joining him, urged on by the haggard and jaundiced emissaries of the big teapot party. This Bill really means that every working man must limit his exercise to a circle described round his own dwelling, and be satisfied with his tea in a mug. I thank the House for the attention with which it has listened to me, and I can only say that this Bill has never been brought before the people of Ireland, and as I believe they will never assent to it, I shall at every stage give it all the opposition which the Forms of this House will allow.

MR. W. JOHNSTON said, he only rose to reply to some observations which had been made with respect to the feeling of the working classes in regard to this Bill. On referring to the evidence taken before the Select Committee, he found that the Society of Amalgamated Engineers of Belfast district, representing 5,000 skilled artizans, had been asked to express an opinion upon the question, when it was found that only about 100 members were opposed to universal Sunday closing. Another witness was the sub-Inspector of Constabulary, and he, from his acquaintance with a district of 70,000 inhabitants, said the general opinion in that district was in favour of closing public-houses on Sunday. He (Mr. Johnston) had entered largely into communication with the working classes of Belfast, and he was of opinion that the great majority were in favour of Sunday closing.

DR. BRADY said, he was quite satisfied that the great majority of the people of Ireland were in favour of this measure. ["No, no!"] The discussion itself, he thought, afforded evidence of this, for during the whole afternoon not one Representative of an Irish county had spoken in opposition to the Bill, but only those hon. Members representing cities and boroughs. An hon. Member who had spoken had declared that his constituents were not in favour of the Bill; but he (Dr. Brady) was free to tell him that they were; and if he had not found that out it was because he had not taken the opportunity to consult his constituents.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, the hon. Member's remarks appeared to be pointed at him, and he took the opportunity of denying that he had had communications from his constituents in favour of the Bill.

DR. BRADY surmised that the hon. Member could have no knowledge of what his constituents required. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) had asked what good had followed a restrictive law? In reply, he would refer him to the state of things existing before 1830. Then the public-houses were open all day on Sunday, and scenes of the greatest dissipation, drunkenness, immorality, and disorder disgraced the streets; but after the Act of 1830 all this gave place to public order, and so also the present Bill would be most beneficial to the people and to Ireland. It would offer the best example possible to the people of England, and the most happy results would be likely to flow from it.

MR. P. J. SMYTH: I wish to refer very briefly to a point of great importance, to which attention has been called by the hon. Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue). I should not have taken part in the debate at all, but for the remark that the House is asked to pass this Bill, not on the grounds of its intrinsic justice, its necessity, or expediency, but in order to prove its willingness at all times to comply with the reasonable wishes of the Irish people—that is, in substance, to legislate for Ireland in accordance with Irish ideas. The motive of the suggestion is most amiable; but the House should not close its eyes to the fact that it leads logically to the conclusion that this House should not legislate for Ireland at all. If hon. Members are prepared to accept the conclusion, well and good, we will go into Committee on the subject; but I submit that until that time arrives the proper, the loyal, and the Constitutional course is to examine and decide upon all matters which come before this House on their merits, taking into account, indeed, local wishes and circumstances, but mindful always that the Parliament of the United Kingdom must legislate with a view to the general interests of the United Kingdom. So long as this House continues to be the Legislature of a United Kingdom the idea that controls its legislation must necessarily be not an Irish, an English, or a Scotch, but an Imperial idea. That is the doctrine controlling the action of the House, and I am at a loss to understand why there should be a departure from it in this instance, and this instance only. It is said, I know not how truly, that England is not a country of ideas; but surely a more extravagant flight of fancy is not to be met with in the whole range of modern poetry than that this House should, would, or could legislate for Ireland in accordance with Irish ideas. Where the raw material is produced, there let it be wrought into fabrics for home consumption. But what is the Irish idea on the question before us? My hon. Friends the Members for Cork City (Mr. Murphy) and Limerick County (Mr. O'Sullivan) may claim to be as true exponents of the national feeling as my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Richard Smyth). If the preponderance of Petitions is on his side, topography and ethnology are with the southern Representatives. In my view, too much stress should not be laid upon Petitions signed by magistrates, lawyers, doctors, town councillors, and officers on half-pay. I am not disposed to undervalue Petitions as a test of public opinion; but when a measure like this of class legislation is proposed, I submit with confidence that it is the opinion of the class whose interests are directly affected which should sway the decision of this House. If the Petitions are examined, it will probably be found that the signers in favour of Sunday closing are, almost without an exception, persons who never by any chance make use of the public-house either on Sunday or week-day. Their motives in petitioning are, I have no doubt, good and philanthropic; but in estimating the value of their Petitions, the House should remember that this Bill inflicts no loss or privation on them, collectively or individually, nor alters in any manner their condition of life. It leaves untouched the well-stocked cellars of the rich, it leaves open still the door of the hospitable club or hotel; but how will it affect the working man, the man who is forced by the necessities of his position to resort to the public-house for needful refreshment? It deprives him at once of a right which he has enjoyed, a legal and natural right, which it is not alleged that on the whole he has abused, compelling him to introduce, and in a more perilous form, into the family the drink which heretofore he has been free to consume at the counter. Will that man be disposed to look kindly on the class legislation that thus abridges his liberty? Will his domestic peace and the morality of his humble household be more secure after the wife and the little children, one by one, shall have been trained to pay their furtive visits each Saturday night to the public-house, in order to procure the supply for the Sunday? At present, regularly as each Sabbath morning breaks, he hears the call of the chapel bell, and to his place of worship he repairs; but the service over, he repairs to the country, and in the afternoon he is free to take a glass of beer with friend or neighbour; but if this Bill becomes law, there is the risk at least that the bells will ring and he will not hear, and that the fields, be they ever so pleasant, will in vain invite to innocent enjoyment. The fact that Sunday closing has been voluntarily adopted in one or two counties is no argument in favour of this measure. Those counties contain no large cities. But if Sunday closing be, as alleged, a popular measure in the country, and if there be no law to prevent its universal adoption, why subject Ireland to the humiliation of being presented at the Bar of this House as a suppliant for a Coercion Act. For, disguise it as we may, this is a Coercion Act. Any Act which, levelled by one class against another, wantonly restricts personal liberty, deserves to be so characterized. To forbid a man to procure needful refreshment at a seasonable hour on any day of the week is, in principle, quite as objectionable as to forbid him to be abroad after sunset. The evidence of Mr. O'Donnell, the magistrate, before the Select Committee, ought to be conclusive as to the fate of this Bill. He proved that during the hours when the public-houses are closed there is more drunkenness in the City of Dublin than during those in which they are open. Is it not, then, a very reductio ad absurdum to extend to the entire day a prohibition thus proved to be promotive of inebriety? The licensed vintners of Dublin are a respectable body of traders; no crime is alleged against them, no complaint is made respecting the manner in which, as a rule, their business is conducted; on the faith of the law as it stands they have expended large sums of money in the enlargement and improvement of their premises; and I ask if be consistent with justice or fair play, if it be in accordance with the custom of Parliament and the spirit of the law, thus uncere- moniously to confiscate their property— for, here, there is no hint of compensa- tion—and attach to them and to their calling an undeserved stigma? If drunk- enness and disorder were proved to be more rife on a Sunday afternoon than on any other day of the week, I might admit a justification for an Act of this descrip- tion, but the contrary has been shown to be the case in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for the city of Cork. Of the numbers who use the public- house, the persons with whom the use degenerates into abuse form but a very small percentage. Let such persons be visited with the full severity of the law; but let not the innocent multitude be associated with the guilty few in one act of indiscriminate condemnation. I have examined the measure very carefully, and I find in it every fault that a mea- sure professing to aim at social reform can possibly have. It abridges liberty, it disturbs vested rights, it embitters class feelings, it imperils the family, and it aggravates the evil for which it pro- fesses to be a cure. Not by coercive enactments, nor sumptuary laws—not by curtailing the scant privileges of the people, nor harassing interference with the prosecution of legitimate trade, will the vice of drunkenness be eradicated and public morality promoted. Leave open the public-house—it is a necessity of our social state; but in juxtaposition with it throw open the public library, the gallery of art, the museum; level the barriers which exclude the people from places designed by nature for healthy recreation—and thanks are due to the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the hon. Bar- onet the Member for Dublin (Sir Arthur Guinness) for the Stephen's Green Bill—look, above all, to the dwellings of the labourer in the fields and the artisan in the towns—help morality in her cease- less struggle with vice, and then we may look forward to the time when we may at least realize the picture of Burke, when vice will lose half its evil by losing all its coarseness.

Mr. KING-HARMAN said, it seemed to him that there was great doubt as to whether the people were unanimous, or nearly unanimous, in favour of the Bill. It was perfectly clear that a large por- tion of the upper and the upper middle classes were in favour of it; but he doubted whether the voice of the people generally had been sounded upon it. If it was brought forward as a tentative measure, to be passed for only three or four years, he might have been disposed to support it; but this was a Bill to de- prive the poor man for ever of his Sunday beer. He thought much might be done to decrease Sunday drinking in Ireland, without having recourse to repressive legislation. From the evidence given before the Select Committee, it would appear that in no part of Ireland did the people so little understand the art of amusing themselves as in Dublin; but, at present, if there was on Sunday a game of football or cricket going on, the police came down, and the summoning and fining of the players followed; so what were the unfortunate men to do who, not possessing comfortable homes, were deprived of the shelter of the public-house? Some harm, he allowed, was done in public-houses in some of the worse districts. Ribbonism and secret societies grew from such places; but if the authorities could be taught to see that there was not necessarily Femi- nism in a game of football on Sunday, and that cricket could be played on that day without being a conspiracy against the British Constitution, there would not be this influence in public-houses, or the necessity for this kind of legislation. In towns there was no doubt that the Sunday closing would merely lead to the purchase of drink on Saturday, and pro- bably an increased consumption among the family, which would not be likely to have a beneficial effect on the rising generation. He was certainly surprised at the very varied colours in which hon. Gentlemen opposite at different times painted the lower classes in Ireland, the contrast between the Irishman, the boroughs desiring the franchise and Irishmen requiring to be protected from the vice of drunkenness being especially remarkable. The hon. Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue) thought that the Sunday outings would be discouraged by the Bill; but it appeared to be rather in the other direction, for the Bill did not restrict the sale of drink on steamers and railways. If he were a publican, he should establish a pleasure steamer or two, and give to his customers all the advantages of getting drink on board. Short trains, too, would lead to a roaring trade at refreshment rooms of railway stations. He did not doubt that of late years the moral tone of the Irish people had been lowered by drink, but not so much by the quantity, as the quality of the drink consumed. He had been told by those whose business required them to be out in all weathers, that they had been obliged to become teetotallers because of the poisonous adulteration practised, and he had seen the lapel of a man's coat burnt by the drops of spirit falling from his mouth. He left the House to imagine what could have been the effect on the coats of the stomach. A more careful exercise of the law by the proper authorities would check this poisonous adulteration, and there would be no need for this legislation. The Grand Juries of counties had directed attention to the question, but the police authorities refused to authorize the Inspectors to carry out the Adulteration Act. If the duties under the present Bill were carried out on the same principle it would be a dead letter, for if they allowed the people to be poisoned by licence, they would also allow them without licence. If the people of Ireland really believed in this measure, let it be brought forward tentatively, or let it be applied to those localities which asked for it. Dublin wished to take its refreshment, and Belfast desired the Bill to be passed. Let the measure be applied to Belfast, and if its effects were undeniable it could be extended from country to town; but if, on the contrary, after two or three years' trial, it was found not to act, then drop it altogether; but they must never think they could make people virtuous by Act of Parliament. If the present system were only properly carried out, harmless games allowed, and restrictions removed, he did not think there would be any necessity for the present measure.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, that he could not proceed with his speech at that hour, and he would therefore move the Adjournment of the Debate.

PRISONS BILL—[No. 116.]

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that he desired in the first place to draw their Lordships' attention to certain statistics, which would show the necessity for the present legislation. It appeared from a Return made to Parliament in the present year, that the daily average number of prisoners in England and Wales in the year 1872 was 17,500, and in the year 1876, 18,986; and the daily average number during the five years ending 1876 gave a total of 18,111. The Bill dealt with prisons 113 in number, which gave on an average one prison for every 22 square miles of area, and for every 200,000 of the population. These figures, however, did not give altogether a correct idea, for the prisons were very unequally distributed in the different counties. Norfolk had as many as five prisons, whilst other counties with a greater population had only one. Rutland, with a population of only 20,000 had one prison, whilst the county of Stafford, with a population of 858,000, had only one. In some prisons the average number of prisoners was 13, in others it was less than 100, and only 11 prisons had upwards of 400 prisoners. The cost of prisons and prisoners in 1876 was £575,380. These statistics showed the necessity for inquiry and investigation. He would briefly draw their Lordships' attention to the course of prison legislation during the last few years. In 1863 the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies (the Earl of Carnarvon) moved for a Committee of their Lordships' House, which was appointed, and which included among its number several very able and experienced Members of the House. That Committee made a Report containing 15 recommendations, in conformity with which Sir George Grey in the following year introduced a Bill into the House of Commons. That Bill, however, did not receive the assent of Parliament; but in the year 1865 the Prisons Act was passed. That Act was not only an alteration in, but a consolidation of, the law relating to county and borough prisons. It also made some alterations in the matter of prison labour and discipline, into the general principles of which he would not enter. The manner in which these principles were enforced, however, varied according to the discretion of the local authorities. What was known as the "separate system" was provided and enforced by the Act; but with regard to prison labour, prison diet, and other details, the various jurisdictions under which these prisons were administered enforced different principles. Considerable variations existed under the present system in the rules of the different prisons relating to the amount and nature of the labour required to be performed by the prisoners, the quality and quantity of the food supplied to them, the enforcement of separation, and the pecuniary profit which resulted from their labour. Now, he thought their Lordships would agree with him that if there was one matter more important than another it was that all punishment should be uniform. One sentence ought to correspond more than verbally with another, and a man in receiving punishment for his offence ought to be subjected to the same discipline in one county as in another. He thought he had shown that the Prisons Act, 1865, wise and judicious as it was, required to be supplemented by some further provisions, and those of their Lordships who took part in the administration of our local goals would feel that the necessity for some such measure as the present had been fully and clearly made out. This measure was one intended to carry out the proposals indicated in Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne, inasmuch as it was framed with the view not only of effecting improvement in the management of our prisons, but also of relieving local burdens. It was not, however, to be expected that the Exchequer would accept the whole charge for the prisons throughout the country, unless at the same time the Government assumed their management. In 1846 a system was established under which half of the cost of the food and clothing of prisoners was paid for by money voted by Parliament for that purpose; but it was felt that it was impossible to extend the system further without the Government taking, as was proposed they should do under this Bill, the whole responsibility for the management of the prisons. Turning to the clauses of the Bill, it would be found that the 3rd and 4th clauses were the foundation of the measure; the former providing that from the time it came into operation all the expenses of the prisons were to be paid out of moneys to be voted by Parliament, and the latter providing that all prisons should be vested in and all prison officers should be appointed by the Secretary of State for the Home Department. With regard to the number of prisons, their Lordships all knew how difficult it was to induce local authorities to combine for the purpose of economy of management; therefore by this Bill, by the 33rd clause, power was conferred on the Secretary of State to discontinue such prisons as he thought were unnecessary. These were all the clauses of the Bill which he thought it was incumbent of him to advert to specially, with the exception of those which related to the Visiting Justices. It would be seen that when the management of the prisons was transferred to the Government the necessity of local control would no longer exist. By Clause 13, however, provision was made for the appointment of a Visiting Committee of Justices, who would have very high and important duties entrusted to them in connection with the management of the gaols. The rules under which the prisons were to be managed would be laid before Parliament before they came into force. One result that was anticipated from the passing of this measure was, that there would be a better and more efficient classification of prisoners than was possible under the present system. The measure had been denounced as savouring too much of centralization and as being destructive of the ancient jurisdiction of the Visiting Justices, while it would establish an undesirable uniformity in our prisons, and that on the whole it would be subversive of the position of the local gentry, which was a chief element in the power and prosperity of England. He did not think that those allegations could be sustained. The truth was that the so-called ancient jurisdiction of the Visiting Justices was really an invention of modern times, it not having been created until the year 1784, rather less than 100 years ago. Then as to uniformity, it might be a very good thing or a very bad thing, according to the subject-matter referred to. Applied to circumstances wholly different, or only having a superficial resemblance, it might be a very bad thing; but if the circumstances were the same it was clear that uniformity must lead to advantage. In reference to the financial aspect of the question—it might be said that local administration was at least the most economical and efficient. He was prepared to show that it was far from being so. The actual average net cost of prisoners in county and borough in 1874-75 was £21 13s. 1d.; but it appeared from the Papers in the hands of their Lordships that in the county of York, which contained four county and four borough prisons, there were 2,331 prisoners. The cost of the prisoners per head varied from £15 11s. 4d. in the county prisons to £34 1s. 2d. The total cost was £56,690, but on the scale of the lowest cost it would be £40,202, or a saving of about £16,400. In the county of Nottingham there were two county prisons and a city prison; in one of the former the average cost per head was £46 15s., in the other £34 3s. 1d. Again, in the county of Lincoln there were five county prisons, containing accommodation for 472 prisoners—whereas the average number was 194, the greatest number known being 299. The 194 prisoners cost, during the year 1874, £8,430; whereas if they had been maintained at the cost per head of the lowest county prison, that at Lindsey, the cost would be only £4,438; showing a saving of cost on the three gaols—and they were within three miles of each other—of £1,608; or, if taken at the average cost of the whole county—namely, £21 13s. 1d.—of £3,408. Then, as regarded Cambridge county, there were three prisons—Cambridge county, Ely, and Wisbeach. In the first-named there was accommodation for 107 prisoners, in the second for 48, in the third for 50—making 205; but the average number was 60½, and the greatest number known was 91. The cost of the 60½ was £2,947; but if they had been maintained at the same rate as prevailed at Ely—that was, at an average cost, after deductions, of £35 10s. 10d.—the total cost would be only £2,141—showing a saving in Cambridgeshire alone of £806; and if at the average cost of the whole county, a saving of £1,648. In face of these facts, he did not think it could be contended that local administration conduced to economy or to a saving of the money of the ratepayers. It was calculated that in carrying out the provisions of this Bill, at least one-half of the existing number of prisons might be dispensed with, still leaving one gaol to each county; and it was computed—and he considered the computation a moderate one—that the saving which would be effected by doing away with superfluous prisons would be £50,000. With regard to prison labour, it was estimated in connection with the Bill that the profits of such labour might be largely increased; and for himself he did not see any reason whatever why the work of those who were incarcerated in county and borough gaols should not be as remunerative as that of those who were in convict prisons. At present the annual cost of the county and borough prisons was estimated at £575,380; or, deducting interest on loans, £538,921, of which £110,800 was already contributed by the Treasury; but, looking to the increased profit to be derived from prison labour, the reduction of the number of gaols, and the consequent saving upon repairs, it was estimated that the total cost to the country under the Bill would not exceed £367,500. Deducting from this amount what was paid by the Treasury, there was left to be provided for by taxes a sum of £257,200. There would evidently, therefore, be a considerable saving to the ratepayers as the result of carrying out this measure. The value of labour in the convict prisons was £19 5s. per head, which was more than double the value of the labour in the county and borough prisons, and there could be no doubt that under an improved administration the value of labour in these prisons would be greatly increased. There was no reason why their labour should not be as remunerative as was that of convicts. The profit was taken at the sum of £113,189; there would be a considerable saving arising from the concentration of staffs, and also in the repairs of prisons—indeed, there appeared to be no reason why those repairs should not be effected by prisoners. He could not but think that by effecting greater uniformity in the administration of our prisons they would be giving effect to wise provisions of our prison law, that they would be able to some extent to counteract wickedness and vice, and thus strengthen the administration of justice and improve the social and moral condition of the people. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Steward).

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that this Bill was one to which he felt considerable objection. He admitted that there were considerable defects in our system of prison administration which required to be remedied; but he did not agree with the noble Earl that if this Bill should be passed it would lead to any great benefit to the country. If no remedy could be found, except that proposed by the Bill, then it ought to pass; but he could not help feeling that means could have been found to improve and make better the management of prisons without placing the whole of such management in the hands of a central authority. The noble Earl had referred to the Act of 1865. Now that Act gave additional powers to the magistrates and to the Secretary of State for the Home Department in the management of prisons. There was to be a uniformity of diet and other things done, and he would like to know whether all the powers of the Secretary of State in that respect had been exercised? As to prison labour, were was the difficulty under the existing law of enforcing a uniform system? The Act of 1865 went a considerable way in that direction. He did not see why there should not be more uniformity in all matters without centralizing in the Secretary of State the entire management of all the prisons of the country. There was no doubt a great superabundance of prisons, and that was one of the strong points of the Bill; the number of useless prisons which existed was a positive disgrace to those who had the management of them—but even as regarded them they might have had a Schedule to the Bill, and enacted that those that were unnecessary should be closed, following up the example of the Act of 1865. Instead of that, they followed up the principle adopted by the Chinaman who burnt his house in order to roast his pig. He believed that this Bill would, instead of bringing about economy, lead to an increased expenditure. He felt alarmed at the principles on which this Bill was based and at the arguments which had been offered to justify its passing through Parliament—they were principles and arguments which might lead to the abolition of local management throughout the country; at any rate, the arguments which had been used in favour of this Bill would equally apply to every branch of local administration. For instance, they would apply to the Poor Law administration, and it might be said to the Education Acts, the administration of which had become of so much importance, and as to which very extensive powers had been placed in the hands of the President of the Council. For his part he regarded centralization not as a bugbear, but as an actual evil. In France nothing was so much regretted by all sensible men as the want of those centres of local administration which they had in this country. No doubt there were advantages in centralization which local administration did not possess; but, on the other hand, there were advantages in local government which a central system did not give; and the question was, whether it could not be shown that there was a large balance of advantages in local administration. It had its advantages and its disadvantages; but what we had to do was to show that the balance of advantages was in favour of change. It must be further remembered that the Government of this country was already heavily burdened; and if Parliament went on placing on the Administration—upon the Heads of the Departments—more and more detailed business, there could be but one result, and that would be neglect in transacting it. The business would be left to subordinate officials, and there would be what would be called Executive Boards—not Boards like the Board of Trade, or the Local Government Board, but Boards that would be responsible to the Minister, who would not have time either to attend to the duties of his office, or to exercise any real control over the proceedings of these officials. Were not the great administrative Departments of the country already overburdened? And he would ask was not the House of Commons overwhelmed with business; and whether if, in addition to their present business, there were to be inquiries into the appointment of turnkeys and other prison officers, the House of Commons would not find itself neglecting its legislative functions in order to discharge duties which would be much better performed by Courts of Quarter Sessions. He looked with much anxiety upon the economical reasons put forward in support of this Bill. He knew that the Bill held out a bait to the ratepayers—there was to be saved to the whole country the munificent relief of £364,000 from the operation of the Bill. He by no means depreciated such a saving to the ratepayers; but he did not think it worth making so large a change for so comparatively insignificant a saving. He did not undervalue changes which would produce economy; but when they were told that it was likely there would be a large financial gain under this Bill he very much doubted whether that would be so. He did not dispute the noble Earl's figures, but he doubted whether his prophecies would come right. He did not think the central managers would spend less money than the present local managers had done, and as to the large revenue from prison labour which the noble Earl calculated upon, he was afraid his noble Friend would find that a very serious opposition would arise to the employment of prisoners in remunerative labour—and he saw by Clause 11 that it was intended to place some limit on the nature and amount of this labour. The Government had already received a clear warning of the pressure that would be brought to bear upon them, and it furnished another instance of the danger of bringing these matters of local administration under the control of Parliament. With regard to the clauses of the Bill, he would admit that they had been carefully and wisely drawn. If, however, we were to have a centralized system in such matters—which he deprecated—the natural consequence would be to place the lunatic asylums and the constabulary under the control of the Government. Every argument which had been used for taking over the prisons applied equally to the lunatic asylums and the constabulary—and he was not aware, indeed, of a single argument that did not apply with still greater force to those branches of administration. He trusted that noble Lords opposite would turn their attention to the improvement and strengthening of our local administration, and that, so far from doing anything to destroy local jurisdiction, they would, by means of County Boards and in other ways, strengthen a system of local self-government from which it would be exceedingly unwise to depart.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE agreed with the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) as to the evils arising from centralization, and hoped that legislation which would attack our system of local administration would form no part of the policy of the Government. At the same time he contended that many of the provisions of this Bill were necessary. The evils of the present system were admitted. For instance, the only way in which the Secretary of State could act under the statute of 1865 was to recommend that certain prisons not required should be abolished; and if the county refused to adopt the recommendation, all he could do was to withdraw the Government grant; but that was a very strong measure. Therefore, looking at all the circumstances, and considering what had been said about uniformity of prison diet, and labour and management generally, he saw no other way of meeting the difficulties than by accepting the measure now proposed by the Government. The real difficulty had always been the extreme jealousy with which such changes had been received by the local authorities. In the county of Kent, not long ago, it was proposed to abolish a small prison in the Eastern Division of the county, and to build a central one, in consequence of the present gaol not having cells of a model character. This raised an immense storm of opposition — indignation meetings were held, and eventually the proposal was thrown out by a large majority. This only showed how difficult it was, under the present system, to effect the changes required. One word as to the suggested saving there would be in prison labour. He submitted that it was not fair to compare what was earned in convict prisons with what was earned in other prisons, as it was quite impossible to teach persons who were sent to prison for short periods—say for three or four weeks—anything that would be remunerative. He was sceptical as to any great saving from prison labour; and as to prison labour not interfering with free labour, he understood that the products of a prison in the northern part of the country were sold in competition with the trades of the country. In one northern prison machinery was used, which showed the great want of uniformity of management. He had heard that the Government proposed to lessen more or less the punishment of hard labour; but if the crank, shot-drill, and other things were abolished, it would be a serious matter, because there were some hardened criminals who came to prison very frequently, and hard labour was the only thing to deter them. At any rate, they could not obtain remunerative labour out of them. As to the change which would be made in regard to the Visiting Justices, he thought that they would be perfectly willing to carry out their duties under the new system, but these, he thought, would be somewhat invidious, for their business would be to listen to trumpery complaints and report them to the Home Office. He thought, however, no better system could be devised than that of Visiting Justices, for it was necessary that there should be some authority on the spot in order to prevent various abuses springing up. He would repeat that, though he agreed with the noble Earl as to the great evils of centralization, yet he saw no other means of meeting the difficulties and evils of the present system which everybody complained of than by passing this Bill, and therefore he should support the Motion for the second reading.

LORD EGERTON OF TATTON was understood to say he did not share the apprehensions which had been expressed by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Kimberley), and therefore supported the Bill without hesitation.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said he did not rise to oppose the Bill, because no one could doubt the expediency of aiming at economy and uniformity in the management of our prisons; but he doubted whether it would not have been better to seek those objects in a way different from that proposed by the Bill. Indeed, he did not see why the Government should not be able to obtain both these results without any Bill at all. He shared the apprehensions expressed by the noble Earl below him (the Earl of Kimberley), and regretted that we were changing local administration with central control for central control and central administration too. He could not see how local authority would remain vested in the Visiting Justices under the Bill, for their only power would be that of making complaints to Commissioners and Inspectors, and they would have no power of giving effect to their own recommendations. The governor of a gaol, who was now their responsible servant, would be so no longer; and he could not see what authority would remain to them. The estimated economical saving was £50,000, with an increase in the profit from prison labour; but, on the other hand, there were to be Commissioners and Inspectors, a new Department of the State, and an army of superior and inferior officials, and he doubted whether any great saving would be effected. But it was still a question whether all that was contemplated might not have been attained without transferring administration from the local to a central authority. He did not see why the principle embodied in this Bill should not be applied to the police, for there was little difference between the governor of a gaol and a chief constable or the governor of a workhouse. The principle underlying the Bill went to the root of all local governments. There were advantages in classifying prisoners according to their sentences; but he feared uniformity would be obtained at too high a price. He did not entertain the suggestion that magistrates were jealous of the loss of dignity, for in many cases they would be only too glad to be rid of a by no means pleasant duty. The underlying principle of this and some other Bills—the weakening of local administration—was not a good one, and, as the Government were dealing by instalments with various matters of local administration, it was important to see that it was not carried any further. Therefore, he deprecated the passing of this Bill, because though some good might come from it, that good might be got without undermining that principle of self-government under which the local affairs of the country had hitherto been administered.

LORD HENNIKER said, he would not detain their Lordships at any great length in discussing this measure, which had been well thrashed out both in and outside Parliament; but, as a Chairman of Quarter Sessions of some years' standing, he desired to make a few observations on some of its provisions. The most serious opposition to the Bill of last year, as well as to the present, was urged on the ground that it would lead to centralization. No doubt too much centralization would be a bad thing; but did this Bill really increase the probability of local affairs being placed entirely under the control of Government? He thought not. There was nothing in the Bill to indicate that the principle would be carried any further. It might as well be said that Government interference of any kind would lead to centralization. Again, it would be almost impossible to conduct local affairs in London. The offices were already overtaxed, and to attempt anything of the kind would bring public Business to a standstill; already a new line of Government offices had been planned for present requirements. Where was it to end if more and more public Business was to be transacted in London? He, for one, should not mind going a little further in the direction of centralization in some matters—the police, for instance; but those who disliked centralization might be sure there was not much chance of the result they dreaded. After all, what power had the magistrates in regard to prisons? Very little. Merely the appointment of officers, their payment and superannuation allowance, and so forth. The Bill gave up no great principle; but even if it gave up the semblance of a principle, what was that when weighed against the good the Bill would do? It had been said that magistrates would no longer take an interest in their business, because their sense of dignity would be offended. He was sure no really useful magistrate would act in that manner. What was the real state of the case? He had said the duties of Visiting Justices were very limited, and on that account they were very little sought after; and it ended in this—that the magistrates residing nearest to the gaol were generally appointed Visiting Justices. He used to attend the gaol when he lived near his own county town; and when he ceased to reside there, he asked to be taken off the committee in order that some one living near the gaol might take his place. He never thought of any loss of dignity occurring thereby, nor had he ever heard of the intention of magistrates to relax their efforts to perform their duties properly. Under the Bill, probably, magistrates might be less desirous to serve on a Visiting Committee; with less power there would be less desire to serve; but it would not cause any magistrates who were really useful, and really took an interest in their district gaols to relax in the discharge of their duties. He did not for a moment suppose that any Secretary of State would frame rules that would have the effect of diminishing in the slightest degree the interest which magistrates took in the discharge of their duties. As to the supposed slur upon magistrates, he ventured to say no one could seriously entertain such an idea. The Bill would provide for a long-felt want. When he reflected on the large economies that could be effected—in such a case as the gaol at Bury St. Edmund's, in Suffolk, for instance, where there were 27 prisoners with nine officers to look after them—when he looked to the spirit of emulation which would prevail among prison officers, when he considered that a uniform system of punishment and a uniform system of management would, in all probability, have the effect of diminishing crime—he could see nothing in all that was urged against the Bill to counterbalance the good it would do. He was extremely pleased to see Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies recognized in the Bill; but the provision which allowed the money belonging to a prisoner on leaving gaol to be handed over to a society was a very important matter. A dole to a prisoner would often take him back to his old friends or his old habits; but these societies were frequently the means of starting men in an honest course of life who, with the least encouragement would have relapsed into crime. He hoped that too large prisons would not be created under the Bill. The experience in Poor Law and other establishments had not been of a nature to encourage the concentration of many persons in the same place. It should be borne in mind that they were not dealing with the convict class only, but more especially with prisoners, many of whom might be reformed. On sanitary grounds, too, it was undesirable to bring large numbers of prisoners together. As to the superannuation of officers, he would have preferred that the Government should have paid these allowances where an officer was dismissed. At all events, it would be wiser to limit the proportion which the local authority was to contribute to the payment of superannuation allowances to officers dismissed within a short period, say, a year, or two years. Under the

Bill this remnant of the payments at present made by local authorities might, and would, no doubt, go on for years in many cases. In conclusion, he gave his hearty support to the measure, which he believed would be productive of much public advantage.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON said, that the Bill was a step, and a very decided step indeed, towards centralization. He did not think that anybody could read its provisions without seeing that that was the direct and necessary tendency of the measure. He also thought that the powers and responsibilities of Visiting Justices must, as a matter of course, be seriously lessened by the Bill. But, in his opinion, the arguments in favour of the measure outweighed any consideration which might be urged in favour of the retention of the existing state of things. Those arguments ranged themselves under these three heads—first, the economy of space; second, the concentration of prisoners; and last, but not least, uniformity of discipline. Those were all objects so valuable in themselves and so essential to the good government of prisons, that the fact that they would be practically attained, if that Bill became law, counterbalanced the objections to which he had referred. He knew of an instance of a county prison, with all the ordinary staff attached to it, in which at one time there was not a single prisoner. Nobody could say that that was a state of things which either conduced to economy, or promoted energy or efficiency on the part of the prison officials. Again, in the county with which he was connected (Surrey), there was a prison built about 25 years ago on the most approved principle, in which, he was happy to say, they had 200 or 300 cells ordinarily vacant. He hoped care would be taken not to mix up short-sentence prisoners and convict felons. He thought it was a great pity that when this Bill was introduced, certain powers which Visiting Justices formerly possessed were not renewed. The most difficult class of prisoners with whom Visiting Justices, or he thought anybody else who had to do with the management of prisons, had to deal, was the refractory, and, especially, the refractory female class. With regard to a male prisoner, there was always the alternative of corporal punishment, which generally kept the prisoner in order; but with female prisoners it was otherwise. At the present moment there was no adequate check within the power of the magistrates upon a violent female prisoner. With regard to superannuation, he was not sure whether a prison official who had served part of his time in one prison and part in another would be able to count the whole time of his service for the purpose of obtaining superannuation. He had intended to have proposed Amendments in Committee with reference to superannuation; but as he now understood that such Amendments ought to be introduced not in this, but in the other House, he did not propose to submit any Amendment in Committee on that subject. He hoped, however, that his noble Friend would give the point his best consideration.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday, the 6th of July next.

QUESTIONS.

VACCINATION ACT—PENALTIES. QUESTION.

MR. GREENE asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the meeting of the Liverpool Health Committee, reported in the "Times" on Saturday the 16th June, wherein it is stated that the father of a family of eight children had paid the fines rather than have his children vaccinated, and that no sooner did the small-pox attack one member of the family than all succumbed and were lying in the hospital suffering from the disease; and, whether it is true that the anti-vaccinationists paid the fines inflicted on people for not complying with the Vaccination Act?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, his attention had been directed to the case, and he had made some inquiries about it. He found that the father of the family alluded to resided in the township of Toxteth Park. A short time ago one of his children caught the small-pox, and the remaining seven took the disease. None of them had been vaccinated. One of them died, and the rest were lying dangerously ill in the workhouse of Toxteth Park. The family came from Glasgow about four months ago, where, according to the father's statement, he had been repeatedly fined for the violation of the Vaccination Law; but he stated that he paid the fines himself. Cases had been repeatedly brought under his (Mr. Sclater-Booth's) notice, in which it was distinctly stated that the fines had been paid by the Anti-Vaccination Society. To what extent that had been done he had no official means of informing the House.

SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION OF COAL —REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS asked the President of the Board of Trade, What steps the Government have taken to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Spontaneous Combustion of Coal at Sea?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: There were two special recommendations made in the very valuable Report of the Royal Commission over which the right hon. Gentleman presided—(1) that in order to make known the descriptions of coal liable to combustion, the Inspectors of Mines should inquire into all cases occurring in cargoes taken from their districts; (2) that exporters should record in their specifications the denomination of the coals in their cargo. The Customs at once undertook to carry out the second, and have caused a form to be filled up accordingly at entry outwards. The Board of Trade consulted the Home Office on the first recommendation, but no general rule has been found necessary. At a recent inquiry into a case of combustion before the Wreck Commissioner,

Mr. Rothery, he stated that Inspectors were not wanted, but that he had himself found this Report very useful, and, no doubt, in some cases, Inspectors might be useful assessors.

NAVIGATION OF THE RED SEA.

QUESTION.

MR. D. JENKINS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, seeing the increasing importance of our trade to India and China by the Red Sea route, and the dangerous nature of the navigation and consequent serious loss of life and property in British ships which has taken place from time to time since the opening of the Suez Canal on approaching the African coast near Cape Guardafui, owing to the absence of a light, Whether there is any recognised authority in possession of that territory with whom Her Majesty's Government are prepared to enter into negotiations for the erection and maintenance of a lighthouse; and, if there is no such authority, whether Her Majesty's Government will take into consideration the advisability of occupying such territory as may be necessary for the purpose, and erecting and maintaining a lighthouse thereupon?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that Her Majesty's Government had for some time been impressed with the importance of the better lighting of the Red Sea. Whether the particular point, Guardafui, was the right point for a lighthouse was a question on which he understood there was some difference of opinion; but there was no difference of opinion as to the importance of making better provision for lighting that part of the coast. The Government were in communication with the Khedive of Egypt on the subject, and he hoped before long it would be in their power to come to some proper arrangement.

NAVY—H.M.S. "REPULSE."

QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he has any objection to produce the papers detailing the circumstances which led to the command of H.M.S. "Repulse" having been taken from Captain F. W. Wilson by his inferior officer Commander Vander-Meulen?

Sir Charles Adderley

MR. A. F. EGERTON, in reply, said the facts of the case were briefly these—The captain of the Repulse during a passage home showed symptoms of aberration of mind, and was therefore invalided, and sent home in charge of the doctor, the command of the ship being taken over by the commander. It did not appear to the Admiralty that any public object would be gained by producing the Papers, and therefore he did not propose to lay them on the Table.

NAVY—GUNNERY LIEUTENANTS

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is the case that several gunnery lieutenants are now on half pay; and, if that is so, whether, considering the expense to the State at which these officers have been trained, he will consider the propriety of appointing them as supernumeraries to the gunnery ships, or elsewhere where their special knowledge may be of service?

MR. A. F. EGERTON, in reply, said, it was true that a certain number of these officers—he believed eight—were on half-pay. It was not desirable to appoint them to the supernumerary list, as the staff for the gunnery ships was complete and fully adequate to meet the requirements of the Service. Moreover, such appointments could not be made without obtaining a Vote.

ARMY—LIEUTENANT COLONEL DAWKINS.—QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON asked the Secretary of State for War, If his attention has been called to a pamphlet circulated by Lieutenant Colonel Dawkins, late Coldstream Guards, on the Half Pay List, entitled "The Duke of Cambridge," and containing charges of the gravest character against His Royal Highness, as well as against other distinguished officers, his military superiors; and, whether, having regard to the whole circumstances of Lieutenant Colonel Dawkins' case, he is prepared to recommend Her Majesty to dispense with that officer's further services?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: In reply to my noble Friend, I may state that the pamphlet circulated by Lieutenant Colonel Dawkins, entitled The Duke of Cambridge, which is of a very extraordinary character, has been sent to me in common with other hon. Members. On becoming acquainted with its contents I directed that a letter should be written to Colonel Dawkins to ask him if he was really the author of it—because, of course, without proof of the authorship it would be impossible to proceed in the matter. To that letter no answer has yet been received. It was written three or four days ago. I am not quite aware of the fact, but I believe that Colonel Dawkins is not in town. I think until I have received some communication from the person responsible for the publication of a pamphlet of such a character I ought not to take any steps.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he happened to know that Colonel Dawkins was abroad.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON: In the public interest I will repeat the Question on a future day.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—AUSTRIAN POLICY.—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay upon the Table the protest sent by Count Andrassy on June 21st to Prince Gortchakow, at Plojesti, concerning the direct negotiations between Turkey and Russia, together with the previous negotiations between Austria and England, and Despatches between Austria and England concerning the Declaration of Independence by Roumania; and, whether Count Andrassy said that he would give those papers to the Hungarian Chambers if the British Government would consent to lay them upon the Table of the House of Commons?

MR. BOURKE: I am unable to lay upon the Table the protest which in the Question of the noble Lord is assumed to have been sent by Count Andrassy. We have no knowledge of such a document. There has been no correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and that of Austria-Hungary regarding the independence of Roumania. There are, therefore, no Papers that could be presented to Parliament. With regard to the statement alleged in the latter part of the Question to have been made by Count Andrassy, we have no information.

FOREST OF DEAN — SALE OF LANDS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL KINGSCOTE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he is prepared to lay before the House the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown as to the powers possessed by Her Majesty's Commissioners of Woods and Forests to sell land in the Forest of Dean under the Act 10 Geo. 3, c. 50, s. 98, or under any other Act?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, he had communicated with the Commissioners, and found that the opinion of the Law Officers had not yet been obtained. There had been a conference on the subject, and when the opinion was expressed he would state the substance of it. It was not usual to lay upon the Table the opinions themselves.

ROUMANIA—TREATMENT OF THE JEWS.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether information has been received at the Foreign Office respecting the atrocities lately committed upon the Jews in Roumania, where, according to accounts through public and private channels, the Jews in the district of Darabina were attacked, and, without reference to age or sex, brutally ill-used, their houses sacked or pulled down, their property destroyed or plundered, and over a thousand persons, including women and children, wounded, many of whom have since died of their wounds; whether information has reached the Foreign Office of similar outrages in Jassy, where a synagogue and many of the houses of the Jews have been pulled down or burnt, their property plundered, and several hundred Jews reduced in consequence to a state of destitution; whether Her Majesty's Government will cause inquiry to be made respecting these alleged proceedings, and, if true, use their good offices to induce the Roumanian Government to punish the offenders and give redress to the injured Jews; and, whether they will at the same time endeavour to impress upon the Government of Roumania the importance and the duty of adopting a course of treatment towards the Jews in that Country more in harmony with the usages of civilised Government?

MR. BOURKE: The only Report that has reached Her Majesty's Government, with regard to the ill-treatment of Jews in Roumania, since the Reports that are on the Table of the House, is contained in a Report from the Vice Consul at Jassy, dated the 15th of April last, relative to an outrage on two Jews at Vashü by the police of that town. One of these was a Russian subject, and a representation was made by the Russian Consul to the Procureur Général upon the subject and redress was promised. With regard to the outrage said to have occurred at a place called Darabina, to which the first Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman refers, no account of that outrage has reached the Foreign Office; but the Consul General at Bucharest has been ordered to address inquiries to the authorities upon the subject, and if such an outrage has occurred representations will be made by the Consul General to the authorities upon the subject and the same remonstrances will be made by the Consul General as have been made in similar instances before.

MERCANTILE MARINE — HOLYHEAD HARBOUR—WRECK OF THE "EDITH" QUESTION.

MR. FRENCH asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is a fact that the steamship "Edith" has now been allowed to remain in Holyhead Harbour, where she is sunk, for a period of nearly two years; whether any accidents have occurred in consequence of her being allowed so to remain; whether she is not in a very dangerous position, and in the direct way of the mail boats approaching and leaving the pier; and, if he can inform the House when she is likely to be removed?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: The steamship Edith, belonging to the London and North-Western Railway Company, was sunk in a collision in Holyhead harbour on September 8, 1875, and still remains there. The only accident which has come to my knowledge is the destruction of the apparatus for raising her, which was caused by the mail boat St. Patrick running on to the wreck, on a calm and light morning, on the 31st of October last, and for which collision the Admiralty Court has pronounced the St. Patrick alone to blame. Though this wreck is unquestionably in the way of navigation, no other craft has touched her. The owners, the railway company, and their contractors, are doing their utmost, at great expense, to remove the wreck, which they would have done already but for the destruction of the apparatus by the steamboat. They have now nearly got the gear repaired and ready for lifting the vessel. A telegram has been put into my hands in which they say that no attempt has yet been made, but an attempt will be made at the end of next week, or the beginning of the following one. The circumstances of the case are detailed in a Parliamentary Paper which was laid on the Table of the House in March last.

CRIME (IRELAND)—MURDER OF MR YOUNG.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, What steps have been taken by the Irish Executive to discover the perpetrator of the murder of Mr. Young, J.P., county Roscommon, and of an attempt to shoot a Mr. Barrett, of county Galway; whether these two gentlemen were shot at in broad daylight; whether it is not known that one at least of the outrages was perpetrated in the presence of a number of witnesses; if he would state how soon after the commission of the crimes steps were taken by the Government to discover the perpetrators; whether rewards have been offered for such discovery in both cases; and, whether there is any reason to believe that these outrages are of an agrarian character?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: Mr. Young and Mr. Barrett were both fired at in broad daylight, but it is not known that either of the two outrages was perpetrated in the presence of a number of witnesses. In Mr. Barrett's case it was reported that some persons were working in the fields near; they stated they heard the shot, but took no notice of it, believing it had been fired at some crows. Immediately after Mr. Barrett had been fired at two suspected persons were arrested, and another has since been apprehended. In Mr. Young's case no sufficient evidence has as yet been obtained to warrant the arrest of any person. In both cases rewards have been offered for the discovery of the perpetrators of the crime, though in a somewhat different manner.

in Mr. Young's case, in addition to a reward of £500 offered by the Government, over £1,000 has been locally subscribed for the same purpose; and I cannot but hope such an expression of public opinion, coming, as it has, from persons of all classes of society, may not be without effect, both in leading to the discovery of the murderer and in deterring evil-disposed persons in the neighbourhood from similar crime. Other steps have been taken by the Government, including the strengthening of the local constabulary force, but I do not think it advisable to state them in detail. I fear there is some reason to suppose that one of these crimes was of an agrarian nature.

VACCINATION ACT—CASE OF J. ABEL.
QUESTION.

MR. PENNINGTON (for Mr. Hopwood) asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether he is aware that another summons was, on the 19th instant, issued against Joseph Abel, Faringdon, for the vaccination of his child Frederick Joseph Abel under 30 and 31 Vic. c. 84, s. 31; and, whether it is discretionary with the justice, under the words "he may if he see fit," to refuse to make the order to vaccinate?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I am not in possession of any information with respect to the case of Joseph Abel's child, and therefore I am unable to inform my hon. and learned Friend whether another summons has been issued. With regard to the legal point upon which I am interrogated, I beg to state that in my view a magistrate who acts under the 31st section of the Vaccination Act, 1867, acts judicially, and may make an order or not as he pleases. In this sense he has a discretion; but I consider that a magistrate who, after it has been clearly proved before him that a child has not been vaccinated, and that there is no reason why the operation should not be performed, should exercise his discretion by declining to make an order for vaccination would disregard his duty, just as much as another magistrate would disregard his who, after the commission of an offence had been clearly established by evidence, should exercise his discretion by declining to convict the offender. In conclusion, I beg to refer my hon. and learned Friend to an authority bearing on this question — namely, "Morisse v. the Royal British Bank," reported in the 26th volume of The Law Journal.

POST OFFICE — CLOSING OF TELEGRAPH OFFICES.—QUESTION.

MR. W. BECKETT-DENISON asked the Postmaster General, If he would explain what is the reason of the issue of the circular from the Post Office (No. 10), dated the 18th inst. whereby fifty-four Telegraph Offices at stations on the North Eastern Railway have been suddenly closed to the public; whether the reason of twenty-two other offices at stations on the same Railway having, by the same circular, been reduced to offices for collection (i.e. despatch) only of messages from the public is that the Post Office declines to allow the Railway Company sixpence for the first mile in the delivery of messages received at such stations, and requires them to deliver the messages free of charge within that limit; and, whether, in view of the great inconvenience that will be caused to the public by this action on the part of the Post Office, the Postmaster General will take measures to restore the status quo with regard, at any rate, to the last-named stations, as soon as possible?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, explained that in several instances the Post Office having incurred the expense of opening post offices in the immediate vicinity of those stations, deemed it inexpedient to retain the offices at the railway stations in question. Careful inquiries had, however, been made in the circumstances of each particular case before a decision in the matter had been arrived at. Twenty-two other offices at stations on the same line had been closed as regarded the delivery of messages, because the Post Office had been informed by the Railway Company that it was difficult to find messengers to deliver the telegrams.

MERCANTILE MARINE—LIME JUICE.
QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he has considered the difficulty British ships trading between foreign parts have had in procuring fortified lime juice; and, if he has made such alterations in the Customs regulations as will enable them in future to have it freely exported to them without their coming home for it?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes. After consultation with the Board of Trade authorities and the Custom House officers, the Treasury have decided to allow lime juice, after having been fortified in accordance with the law, to be exported from the Customs' warehouses as general merchandise, and not to confine that privilege to juice intended only for ship's stores for particular ships. Orders to that effect will be given by the Custom House without delay.

THE CONFESSIONAL—"THE PRIEST IN ABSOLUTION."—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of the Government to adopt any measure for the protection of members of the Established Church against the Confessional practices of such of the clergy of that Church as recognises the doctrines disclosed in the book called "The Priest in Absolution," having regard to the Act known as Lord Campbell's Act, which prohibits the publication of such doctrines and practices?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I must confess that the last part of the Question appears to me to be not altogether intelligible. I have looked at the Act to which it refers, and I do not see that there is anything in it relating to "doctrines and practices;" but with regard to the main Question which the hon. Member puts, I do not see that there are any measures which the Government could adopt in this matter, and I must venture to express my own opinion that members of the Church will find their best protection against any mischief from the practices to which he refers in the fact of those practices having been disclosed and made a matter of public notoriety and reprobation.

ILLEGITIMATE INTESTATES' ESTATES (SCOTLAND)—PATERSON'S ESTATE.

QUESTION.

MR. ERNEST NOEL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, considering the unanimous opinion in Scotland expressed by the votes of Scotch Members in the Division on Tuesday evening, he will recommend the Treasury to re-consider their decision regarding the disposal of the personality of the late Mr. Paterson?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the decision of the Treasury in the case of the personality of the late Mr. Paterson was taken after full consideration, and in conformity with the usual practice of the Treasury and with the provisions of the law. It was challenged by the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander); but the House, after a discussion, affirmed the view taken by the Government. Under these circumstances he did not see any reason for re-considering the decision which had been arrived at.

METROPOLIS—THE PARKS—VOLUNTEER DRILLS.—QUESTION.

MR. COOPE asked the Secretary of State for War, If he is aware of the great inconvenience that arises from the crowds of spectators in the parks of the Metropolis on the occasion of the drill or inspections of the Volunteers, making practice in battalion drill, and especially in the new formation for attack, almost impossible; and, whether he is prepared to adopt such measures, by mounted police or otherwise, as may check this evil, and enable the Volunteer Forces to carry out satisfactorily the drills required of them?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I must inform my hon. Friend that the Parks are under the jurisdiction in certain cases of the Rangers, and in the other of the Office of the Board of Works:—the Secretary of State for War has a jurisdiction over them. But in consequence of similar complaints to those to which my hon. Friend has referred, I applied to the Home Office in 1875, and they undertook that a mounted Police Inspector and eight policemen should attend when the Volunteers were going through their summer drill. I believe that can now be done if notice be properly given.

ARMY—OFFICERS OF THE AUXILIARY FORCES.—QUESTION.

MR. PRICE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any rule or minute exists at the War Department prohibiting officers of the Auxiliary Forces from holding two commissions?

the same time in different branches of those forces, and, whether it is not the case that certain officers now hold commissions other than honorary commissions at the same time in the Militia and Volunteers; and, if so, whether any special exception has been made in the case of these officers?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: There are very few instances in which officers of the Auxiliary Forces hold two commissions at the same time in different branches of those Forces. This has been permitted by a Regulation, which says that—

“Every officer holding active commissions for more than one branch or two such commissions in the same branch of the Auxiliary Forces will elect before the 1st April, 1873, which he wishes to retain, and will resign the other, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State that the relaxation of the rule in particular cases would be advantageous to the public service.”

There are also other rules of a similar character.

MARITIME CONTRACTS BILL. QUESTION.

MR. HAMOND asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is his intention to proceed with the Maritime Contracts Bill this Session?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: This is a Bill which touches such large interests, and raises such important questions that, although it had been carefully considered by the Government before it was introduced, we feel it will be only right before proceeding with it to give an opportunity of discussing it before a Select Committee. We have not been able to find a day for the second reading, and at this period of the Session it is almost impossible to get the Bill read a second time and carried through a Select Committee and the subsequent stages. Under those circumstances we propose to discharge the Order.

NAVY—H.M.S. “ALEXANDRA”—THE REPORTED MUTINY.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he has yet received any Report from the Commander in Chief of the Mediterranean Fleet of the circumstances in connection with the late disturbances on board Her Majesty's ship “Alexandra;” and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay such Report or further information upon the Table of the House?

MR. A. F. EGERTON, in reply, said, that no further Report than that to which he referred in reply to a similar Question a few days ago had been received with regard to the disturbance; but in a private letter from the Commander-in-Chief in the Mediterranean to one of the members of the Board of Admiralty it appeared that the first Report, of which he gave the substance in his Answer, furnished all the information which was available on the subject.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT— SCHOOL DISTRICTS IN LINCOLN- SHIRE.—QUESTION.

MR. CHAPLIN asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether any progress has been made in surmounting the difficulties in the way of the formation of school districts in the Fens surrounding Boston; and, if so, how soon the first notices of his Department with respect to those districts are likely to be issued?

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the formation of school districts in the Fens about Boston was a matter of no ordinary complication, and he was sorry to say that when he saw his way to a settlement fresh difficulties had arisen. He could not at that moment say how soon the notices would be issued; but no time would be lost, and the difficulties would soon be overcome.

THE COLORADO BEETLE.—QUESTION.

MR. MARK STEWART asked the Vice President of the Council, If his attention has been called to a report in the “Pall Mall Gazette” announcing that the Colorado beetle has made its appearance in a district in Germany; and, if any precautions have been adopted to prevent its introduction in England?

VISCOUNT SANDON: I am not surprised that the hon. Gentleman should address to me a Question on this subject, owing to the great interest which it has excited. Since I saw the announcement in the newspapers with respect to the appearance of the Colorado beetle I have communicated with the Foreign Office, and they telegraphed at once to the different ports to ascertain the truth of the report. I am sorry to say that this afternoon I heard they had received a statement from the Consul General at Cologne confirming the report. The telegram is as follows:—

“Colorado beetle was found with numerous larvæ, in a potato field near Mülheim. Yesterday, before the authorities, the field was fired with sawdust and petroleum. One beetle was seen on wing. It is feared the plague may spread.”

Without waiting for this answer, the Privy Council wrote at once to the Commissioners of Customs asking them to give instructions to their officers at the various ports to keep a special look out for the arrival of these destructive insects. The Commissioners of Customs have been for many years alive to the importance of this subject, and, as long ago as March, 1875, they issued a Circular to their officers to examine carefully all the potatoes that came from America, and to destroy by fire all particles of potato haulm or stalks, as well as loose soil. In November, 1876, the Commissioners issued another Memorandum, with an engraving of the beetle. We have also thought it desirable to republish at once and circulate a Memorandum issued in last October by the Canadian Minister of Agriculture, describing the habits of the beetle and suggesting the best means of getting rid of it, should it unfortunately appear. A coloured engraving of the insect is appended to the Memorandum. If my hon. Friend will look at these Papers, and thinks them of public interest, I shall be happy to lay them on the Table of the House.

EAST INDIA (MAJORS OF ARTILLERY).

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that on Monday evening he had made a statement respecting Sir John Adye which had been variously reported. He had not meant to express his opinion as adverse to the claims of the Indian Majors, but had been, in fact, the medium of communication between the India Office and the War Office, without being in favour of the course pursued. Some of the reports might possibly have produced a contrary impression.

Viscount Sandon

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

INLAND REVENUE — COLLECTION OF TAXES.—RESOLUTION.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD, in rising to call attention to the injustice and inconvenience occasioned by compelling private individuals to undertake the collection of Income Tax, Inhabited House Duty, and Land Tax; and to move—

“That the practice of imposing compulsory on private individuals the duty of collecting Income Tax, Inhabited House Duty, and Land Tax, is unjust and inexpedient, and that Her Majesty's Government be requested to make provision for discontinuing it,” said, that in many rural parishes under the present system there was no great hardship, because in them the duties were light, and in very large towns, such as Liverpool and Birmingham, where the duties were not light, the gain was considerable, and there was no difficulty in getting a regular rate or rent collector to undertake to collect these taxes. But there were cases of towns not of the first order in point of population, and suburban districts of the largest towns, which might be in a different county, and there very great hardship was felt. In these places a multitude of small sums, perhaps two or three thousand ranging from 6d. up to several shillings, had to be collected, and the poundage was quite insufficient to yield adequate remuneration. Independent gentlemen or large merchants, to whom it was the greatest possible hardship to be taken from their business, and also hard-worked tradesmen, were nominated to collect these taxes. If they declined they were fined £20, which was a large sum for a small tradesman, and if they escaped they had often, as he was informed, to pay black mail. He knew of more than one instance in which the choice of the persons nominated could be attributed to no other motive than spite or a desire to give annoyance. It often happened that with ~~such~~ whose responsibilities or ~~thousands of~~ pounds a colleague was associated of whom he knew nothing, who could neither read nor write, and was not even familiar with the English language. In one case a respectable chemist was appointed, and a colleague was given him who could neither read nor write. In another a gentleman went to live in Wales; he was appointed over and over again; he could not speak Welsh, and had to travel five or six miles over a mountainous district to discharge the duties of his office. In another case a man had to leave his business for six weeks, and the total amount of poundage which he received was only 36s. 6d. In another case a man out of his own resources had to pay the Commissioners £300 in advance for money he had not got in. The manager of the North Staffordshire Railway wrote to him to say that he had been appointed to collect these small sums, he had been obliged to get another to discharge the duties, and not only had he to pay the man a large sum, but he was personally responsible if the man ran away. At Stockton a collector failed, the Government had not got his sureties' bonds signed, and therefore the sureties were not liable. The Government, instead of losing the money, re-assessed the unfortunate people who had paid the tax once, and had got a receipt for the money. Several paid the tax, others resisted, and had their goods seized, one man to the amount of £20. There were many similar cases. With respect to the land tax the trouble of collection was very much increased when such small sums as 6d. had to be collected. The main objection to the income tax was much graver than that of the trouble, annoyance, and expense. It was specially offensive to a large class that a tradesman in a suburban district should have the duty of going round and ascertaining the amount of income tax his rivals had to pay, and in that way a considerable number of persons became acquainted with the affairs of their neighbours. This was a grievance which slumbered, but he had no doubt we should hear a good deal about it before long. He did not see why a man should be compelled to collect house duty, land duty, or income tax any more than he should be compelled to clean the Foreign Office, sweep the road, and so on. All he asked was that the Government should find a remedy for the grievance. There were two or three remedies which might be suggested. In the first place, the Inland Revenue might be got to collect the taxes directly by officers of its own. But that might be considered too expensive. The clerks to the Commissioners had an interest in these things, and were opposed to reform. But if they were paid by fees for work done, he knew on very good authority that the Inland Revenue Office was perfectly willing to do the work, and all that was wanted was an enactment by which the Inland Revenue Board might unite parts of divisions for taxing purposes, whether in the same county or not. He trusted the Government, having had their attention called to the reality of this grievance, would do what they could to apply a remedy.

MR. MUNTZ seconded the Motion. He could bear his testimony to the fact not only that the grievance existed, but that it had, in fact, become intolerable. It was said to be a remnant of a very old system under which disagreeable impositions were practised on the people; but the older it was the greater the necessity for its removal. The evil might be remedied by compelling the collectors of poor rates to collect these taxes also, allowing them the remuneration that was now allowed to individuals in the way of poundage. Some of the collectors objected to take that course; but there was no reason why they should not be compelled to do it, or why, if it were necessary, an Act of Parliament should not be passed for the purpose. That course was already followed in several parishes, where one collector was employed to collect the poor rate, the house tax, and other taxes. In that way it was made worth the while for a respectable man to undertake the work.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the practice of imposing compulsorily on private individuals the duty of collecting Income Tax, Inhabited House Duty, and Land Tax, is unjust and inexpedient, and that Her Majesty's Government be requested to make provision for discontinuing it,"—(Mr. Sampson Lloyd,)
—instead thereof.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed, that he had very little to urge in opposition to what had been said with respect to the existing system by the Mover and Seconder of the Motion before the House. He had more than once admitted the inconvenience which resulted from the present practice. Not only had he admitted it, but the inconvenience had been recognized by his Predecessors, and on former occasions attempts had been made to remove the difficulty by proposals to assign the duty of collection to the officers of the Inland Revenue. But those proposals, he was bound to say, had not been received with very great favour. In fact, they had been very strongly objected to, and it had been found impossible hitherto to get the officers of the Inland Revenue to do the work at all. The proposal that they should leave the collection where it was profitable, to those who now carried it on, in order that they might continue to receive the considerable sum which they divided by way of poundage, and that the Government should undertake the duty where the collection would be unprofitable was scarcely a fair one, and he thought a change, if made, must be a more general one; but difficulties had hitherto been found to impede any settlement. This, however, he would say, he had never given up the idea of making some change in the present practice, and he should be ready on consultation with the Inland Revenue Department to make a serious endeavour to meet the difficulty which had been mentioned, and of which he was perfectly sensible. The Government had hoped that the passing of a Valuation Bill might afford some facilities for making an improvement in the present state of things, and the matter had rather stood over in consequence; but he would undertake, on the part of the Government, to look again carefully into the subject, and see whether it was possible to adopt any reasonable plan which would avoid the difficulties of the present system.

MR. MUNDELLA felt a good deal of satisfaction at what had been said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The system complained of was made the means of extortion which rankled a good deal in the minds of those who were subjected to it. A few days ago he had put in the hands of the Secretary to the Treasury a letter from a tradesman of Sheffield who had been called upon to collect these taxes—a task which it was shown would have so occupied his time that he must in consequence neglect his own business. He asked for instructions, but was simply laughed at, and was told if he paid so much money to a certain person he would get rid of the responsibility. One placed in that position had to employ persons in whom he had no confidence, and if those persons were defaulters he must make good their defalcations. It was hard that he should be asked to undertake duties with which he was not acquainted, and not be informed as to what the duties were, and that he should have to pay black mail to somebody else to do the work for him. It was a kind of extortion which ought to be subjected to some sort of punishment or rendered impossible.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD reminded the House, with regard to what the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said as to the Valuation Bill being a probable medium for effecting an improvement in the present practice, that with the same object in view he had himself placed in the Notice Paper a special clause to enable the local rates and the Imperial taxes to be collected through the same channel. Consequent on that Notice many Petitions had been presented from influential local bodies in support of the proposition, and he had received letters speaking of it as likely to prove advantageous both to the public and to the Government. It was a matter of Imperial importance, and ought to be considered.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD intimated his readiness, after what had fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to withdraw his Motion.

On the Question that leave be given to withdraw the Motion, there being several "Noes"—

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

EAST INDIA—MR. FULLER AND MR. LEEDS—INDEPENDENCE OF JUDGES OF THE HIGH COURTS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. LOWE, who had a Notice on the Paper to call attention to a Despatch from the Secretary of State for India to the Governor General of March 22nd 1877; and to move—

"That in the opinion of this House, the power of the Crown to remove Judges of the High Courts of India who hold their office during Her Majesty's pleasure, ought to be exercised on the same principles as if they held their office during good behaviour and not otherwise,"

said, the question he had undertaken to bring before the House was of such transcendent importance that he should make no apology to the House for bringing it in at once, omitting the circumstances out of which it arose. The subject itself was quite sufficiently large, and he should not go into the details of the occurrences which gave rise to it. Suffice it then, to say that owing to differences of opinion which had arisen between the Governor General of India and the Supreme Court of the North West Provinces, a reference had been made to the Secretary of State for India, proposing to him certain questions of very momentous importance in regard to the status and position of the Judges in India. On the despatch upon which he founded his observations—which was the last in the Papers, bearing date March 22 of this year, which raised these questions—the Secretary of State for India made what seemed to him a very sensible remark. It was to the effect that the questions submitted to him were merely speculative. They did not arise out of circumstances which had occurred in India, and which he had made the subject of another despatch, and were speculative questions. He thought the Secretary of State for India was right in saying so, and for this reason—the Judges complained of being censured by the Government for certain opinions they had expressed, but these were not judicial opinions. They were not given under the requisite protection for judicial opinion, and were not given after the hearing of both sides. If Judges chose to give opinions without hearing both sides, although their opinions might be very valuable, they were not entitled to that protection which was, and ought to be, thrown over judicial proceedings. But then what surprised one was, that as the matter was, in his opinion, merely speculative, the Secretary of State did not go on to say that as it was only a speculative question he declined to give any opinion upon it. He thought the Secretary of State for India would have taken a wise course if he had said—"The case has not yet arisen; when it does, I shall be prepared to give my opinion, but meantime I decline." However, he took a different course. He set out distinctly what the questions proposed to him were, and he gave an answer to them; and it was those questions and that answer to which he (Mr. Lowe) wished to call the attention of the House. A point more important had seldom arisen before the House than that which arose upon this Correspondence. It was infinitely larger than the Secretary of State or those who advised him seemed to have had any idea of when they entered into the question. The Secretary of State said the questions submitted to him were—(1) Whether the Judges of the High Courts were subject to the authority of the Governor General in Council; (2) whether it was within the province of His Excellency in Council to publicly approve or condemn the action of the Courts in matters which fell clearly within their functions; and (3) whether in India the Courts enjoyed the independent authority and prestige of the English Courts. He could not tell what advice the Secretary of State took in the matter; but he might not unreasonably have said they were questions to be decided not by the Secretary of State, but by high legal and judicial authorities. However, the Secretary of State appeared to have had no misgivings; he launched into the whole subject, and treated it in the most summary and decisive manner. He did not, indeed, answer them categorically; but he went into an argument in which he clearly implied that, in his opinion, the Judges of the High Courts were subject to the Executive authority of the Governor General; that it was right for the Governor General to condemn or approve the action of the Courts in a public manner; and that the Indian High Courts did not enjoy the independent authority and prestige of the English Courts. In short, all three questions were answered in the negative. It might also be here mentioned that the Governor General had also referred certain questions to the Secretary of State; whether he, the Governor General, was not, as the head of the Executive Government in India, responsible for the administration of justice; whether he had not a right to punish the Judges—the Imperial Judges as well as inferior Judges—for any miscarriage of justice, and whether he had not a right to pass public censure on them in regard to the administration of justice if he thought proper. Neither of the despatches noticed the questions of the Governor General at all; and as the Governor General said he would go on doing as before until he was told it was wrong, it might be taken that the questions were answered in the affirmative, just as the other three questions had been answered in the negative. Such was the present state of things. Everything claimed by the Governor General was conceded; everything claimed by the High Courts was repudiated; and all that remained to be seen was the principles and reasons upon which the Secretary of State's decisions was based. The Secretary of State contended that there was a vital difference between the position of Indian and English Judges. The Secretary of State said—

“Until the Act of Settlement all English Judges held their office, as Indian Judges do now, during Her Majesty's pleasure. When Parliament desired to assure their independence and to withdraw them from the authority of the Executive, it enacted that their commissions should be made ‘during good behaviour.’ But when Parliament set up the existing High Courts of India in the year 1861, it did not think fit to adopt towards them the same policy which had been adopted and maintained towards the Courts in England. On the contrary, it was specially enacted that the Judges in all the Courts established under the Act of 1861 should ‘hold their offices during Her Majesty's pleasure.’ It appears to Her Majesty's Government impossible to treat this difference, deliberately established between the Indian and the English Courts, as accidental and inoperative. In withholding from the Indian Judges the independence of the Executive, which had been on a solemn occasion formally conferred upon the English Judges, Parliament must be taken to have fully intended the consequences of the important distinction which it was sanctioning. The right to dismiss any person holding an office carries necessarily with it a right to indicate the conduct which may, if persisted in, incur dismissal. In other words, it involves the right to approve or condemn the action of the officer who is so liable to be dismissed. . . . This appears to me to be in strict right the relation subsisting between your Government and the Judges in India. But it is not necessary for me to state to you that, as a matter of policy, any Executive action trenching on the independence of Judges in the exercise of their purely judicial functions, could only be justified by reasons of extreme necessity.”—[East India (Mr. Fuller and Mr. Leeds) Parl. p. 173. 1877.]

In other words, the Secretary of State for India was distinctly of opinion that Judges in India were dependent on the Executive, and did not enjoy independence; that it was lawful for the Governor General to threaten those Judges, to point out things for which he might be induced to discharge them; and that, as a matter of right, he might interfere with them in the exercise of their purely judicial functions, though, as a matter of policy, it might not be advisable to do so, except in extreme cases. Anything more important or momentous could hardly be imagined. He would endeavour to combat as well as he could those statements, and show that they were utterly groundless and fallacious. In the first place, the conclusion was not established by the premisses. The conclusion was, that the Governor General had a right to interfere in the administration of justice—that it was dependent on him, and that he had the power of lecturing the Judges publicly or privately. That, he apprehended, must from the nature of the case be a mistake, and for this reason. The Prerogative of dismissing Judges rested with the Queen, during whose pleasure they held office. But, as the House knew, Her Majesty did not exercise this or any other power, except on the advice of a responsible Minister. Now, who was the responsible Minister in the present case? Not the Governor General of India, who was a mere deputy holding delegated powers, but the Secretary of State for India. So that Lord Salisbury's argument amounted to this—that because the Queen, by the advice of the Secretary of State for India, could remove an Indian Judge, therefore the Governor General, who had no power to advise Her Majesty on the subject, should have all the power implied by the words that the Courts of India were dependent upon the Executive. It was manifest that the difference between a Minister who was responsible for the act of the Crown, and a person who acted as a deputy of the Crown with delegated powers had been overlooked, and that the authority claimed for the Governor General ought only to be exercised by the Secretary of State in Council. Therefore, accepting all Lord Salisbury's premisses, the conclusion to be drawn from them was that the Governor General had none of the powers attributed to him. But that was a very small part of the case. This matter was argued by the Secretary of State entirely on the ground of the tenure of office—solely as a question of tenure. It was said that

“until the Act of Settlement, all English Judges held their office as the Judges in India do now, during Her Majesty’s pleasure.” That statement was entirely inaccurate. It was a matter of dispute amongst antiquaries, whether from the earliest times our Judges did not hold their office during good behaviour. Hallam, Coke, and others might be cited as authorities on this point. The Act which gave the Judges their present status was the Act 12 & 13 Will. III. During the whole reign of William the Judges held during good behaviour. In such an important document, it was extraordinary that trouble had not been taken to ascertain the ordinary details relating to the question. Assuming that the Judges held office during the pleasure of the Crown, and not—as those in England virtually did—during the pleasure of Parliament, did that fact really entail all the consequences which it seemed to be supposed resulted from it? If not, there was nothing to be said. It was a purely metaphysical statement, drawn from some abstract opinion, and might have been written of some country which had no history at all. This was not a metaphysical question, to be dealt with by clever dialecticians. It was not a question merely as to the meaning of a form of words. The answer to it must be gathered from the course of English history. The notion that Judges who hold office during the pleasure of the Crown, and were by virtue of that tenure placed at the disposal of the Executive, and exercised as such no freedom in administering justice, was an absolute figment, and had no foundation in history. If the House looked carefully into the matter, they would find that it did not turn at all on the question of tenure. In fact, the question of tenure had been so little regarded, that we did not know what had been the tenure in the case of our early Judges; and it mattered not really what it was, because whether they held from the Crown or during good behaviour, the Crown being the Judges as to good behaviour, it came very nearly to the same thing. The important point was—who had the power to turn out the Judge; and the real security which our Judges enjoyed was not to be found in the words “during good behaviour,” but in the fact that they could only be turned out with the consent of the two Houses of Parliament. In the olden times—which it might seem pedantic to refer to, but the due consideration of the question made it necessary—the thing which was looked to as the security of the integrity of the Judges was not at all the tenure, of which, as he had said, there was no trace whatever, but was the Judge’s oath. The oath was this—

“That he will serve the King and indifferently administer justice to all men, without respect of persons; take no bribe, give no counsel where he is a party; nor deny right to any, though the King, by his letter or by express words, command the contrary; and he is answerable in body, lands, and goods.”

Again and again, in arbitrary times, when the Judges resisted the importunities of the Executive, their answer was, not that their tenure was so and so, but that their oath bound them. The first case he would allude to was that of Chief Justice Hussey, in the reign of Henry VII.—one of the most arbitrary Princes who ever sat on the Throne of England. Chief Justice Hussey besought Henry VII.—

“That he would not desire to know their opinions beforehand for Humfrey Stafford, for they thought it should come before them in the King’s Bench judicially, and then they would do that which of right they ought; and the King accepted of it.”

The next case he would cite was still more remarkable, for there they found the Judges discharging the duties of the House of Commons, rather than acting as the passive slaves of the Crown. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth the Judges prayed for an audience of the Queen, and having obtained it, took the liberty of admonishing her with reference to the committal or detention of persons, by the command of Nobles or Counsellors, against the law of the Realm. It did not appear that the Queen was at all displeased with their conduct. Then, in the Case of Commendams, it appeared that the King—one of the Stuarts—signified to Chief Justice Coke, through the Attorney General, that he would not have the Court proceed to judgment till he had spoken with them. The Judges certified to His Majesty that they were bound by their oaths not to regard any letters that might come to them contrary to law, but to do the law notwithstanding; that they held with one consent the Attorney’s letter to be contrary to law, and such as they could not yield to, and that they had proceeded according to their oaths to argue the cause. Those were Judges who probably held during the pleasure of the Crown. By the arbitrary Act of James I. Coke was dismissed for his resistance. No doubt terror was practised by the Stuarts, more or less, upon the Judges, and they were made to do things which were quite contrary to their oaths and to their sense of duty; but though these things were done, they were never done as a right, and were never justified. No one was ever bold enough to say that the tenure by which the Judges held office gave the King the right to direct them in their duty. Falkland—who shed his blood in the cause of the Stuarts—said in the course of a speech in the House of Commons, at the time of the Long Parliament, referring to Queen Elizabeth—

“The Queen, in the 29th year of her reign, erects a new office in the Common Pleas, and grants it to her servant Richard Cavendish. She sends to have him admitted. Four pre-emptory letters the Judges refuse, on the ground that the place belongs to others. At last they write that the Queen had taken her oath for the execution of justice according to law, that they did not doubt that when Her Majesty was informed that it was against law she would do what befitted her. For their parts, they had taken an oath to God, to her, and to the commonwealth, and if they should do it without process of law before them, and only upon her command put the other out of possession, though the right remained, it were a breach of their oaths; and, therefore, if the fear of God were not sufficient, they told her the punishment that was inflicted on their predecessors for the breach of their oaths in the time of Richard II. might be sufficient warning to them. The Queen, hearing these reasons, was satisfied, and the Judges heard no more of the business.”

Looking at these cases, and taking into account not the tenure merely, but all the concomitant history, it would be seen how little foundation there was for the arguments which had been used for the purpose of establishing in India a dangerous doctrine which would place the judicial administration under the heel of the Government. There was a passage which he would read from Lord Clarendon, which showed what was expected of the Judges at the time when the question of Ship Money was brought before them, and it was all the more remarkable, because it was written by one who was inclined to make as little as possible of such a matter. He said that the people did not so much care what was done as to benevolences and Ship Money or anything else, for that it pleased them to give their money to the King; but that they drew a great distinction between the King and the Judges, and that they did not consider the Judges were covered by the authority of the King. Lord Clarendon added—

“The danger and mischief cannot be expressed that the Crown and State sustained by the deserved reproach and infamy that attended the Judges being made use of in this and the like arts of power, there being no possibility to preserve the dignity, reverence, and estimation of the laws themselves but by the integrity and innocency of the Judges.”—[Bk. I. p. 70.]

They at that time felt that the Judges were bound, just as much as we considered our Judges to be in more favourable circumstances now, to administer justice with impartiality, and the passages which he had quoted fairly showed, he thought, that the tenure on which the whole of the argument of those who took the opposite view of the question was based had nothing to do with it; and that, in accordance with the Constitution of England, it had always been held that whether a Judge held during pleasure or not, he was bound by the oath which he had taken, and liable to the most severe punishment for its infringement. In the reign of Richard II. Chief Justice Tresillian had been hanged because he had given an extra-judicial opinion at Nottingham to the King. No doubt that was an act of revolutionary violence, but what was remarkable was the ground they chose to justify their deed. There had always been respect in this country for the judicial office, and it was held that it should be independent and free, until this ground had been taken up at the present advanced period of the world. Before he closed that part of his argument he might observe that Lord Clarendon, in one of his speeches said, that the Twelve Judges were “like the support of the throne of Solomon—under the throne in obedience, but yet lions.” There were many hon. Gentlemen now in the House when the present Act for creating judges in India was passed, and he felt quite sure that if the point now at issue had at the time been raised in any way, the doctrine which was set up would have met with a most indignant negative.

Mr. Lowe

But it was said that Parliament meant to make the Indian Courts dependent on, and subject to, the authority of the Executive. Now, the only reason in favour of that view was the preservation of a tenure which he had shown to be consistent with the noblest ideas of judicial independence. But here he touched on firmer ground and escaped from metaphysics. The Commission which framed the present law never meant anything such as that for which the Government now contended. Their object was to get rid of the Sudder Court, which was an Oriental Court, and to establish a High Court much after the model of our English Courts. Under the direction of the late Master of the Rolls (Lord Romilly), Chief Justice Jervis, and many other eminent men, it was intended that the Judges should be treated all alike; and he, as a witness, could state with the greatest confidence that it never entered the minds of the Commission to found a Court which could in any way be placed under the authority of the Executive or subjected to the indignity contemplated by the despatches before the House. But it was contended that the Judges, because removable at the will of the Crown, were under the control of the Crown. But if that were so, what was to become of the Lord Chancellor? We were in the habit of looking at the Lord Chancellor as the highest of our Judges, yet he had always held office at the pleasure of the Crown. Was it, therefore, to be supposed that he was less independent than any of the other Judges, or that Her Majesty had any right to interfere with him in the administration of justice? But let him go a little further: The case of the Colonial Judges under Burke's Act was in point. Almost all the Colonial Judges at the time when he himself was in Australia held their offices during the pleasure of the Crown. Yet he ventured to say that in no respect were they regarded as being less independent than the Judges in Westminster Hall. Now, if the tenure of the Colonial Judges did not deprive them of independence, why should it be held to deprive the Judges in India? If the doctrines which he had laid down were challenged, then the same thing must be upheld in the Colonies as in that country. Were the Government prepared for that? Was there, he would ask, anything ever done so rash and inconsiderate as to raise a question of enormous magnitude on account of a trifling squabble in a police-office court, and to take a step which ought not to be taken except on the fullest information and after the most mature consideration? No such right as that which was now contended for on the part of the Government had, he maintained, ever before been claimed by an English Executive. There was, in reality, no right to dismiss. There was a power to dismiss which, like all powers conferred by the law, must be exercised within the duty of the person exercising it and with reference to the purposes for which the power was given. Such a power would confer no right to interfere with the administration of justice. The Queen could do nothing wrong; but did that imply that a wrong would not be done if a murder were committed by the Sovereign? It implied, he contended, an absolute insult to Royalty when it was maintained that such was the absolute power of Her Majesty over the Judges that she might exercise any influence she pleased in the administration of justice. The right course for persons clothed with the power of dismissal to pursue was to guide themselves in all respects by the practice of Parliament; and if the independence of the Judges was good for England and the Colonies, why should it be an evil to India? One of the very first principles of good government was the separation of the judicial and the Executive power, and any attempt to confuse the two together was an attempt to go back to the worst and lowest periods of our history. It was said, however, that the Executive had the right to interfere. In the beginning of the last century, Holt, then Lord Chief Justice, gave a decision adverse to the decision of the House of Lords in the case of "Ashley and White." But when the House of Lords called him before it for having delivered a judgment by which he set aside the jurisdiction of the House, Lord Chief Justice Holt said—

"I hold an authority independent of yours. I gave my reasons for the judgment in that place in which I had sworn to administer justice. By the House of Lords I look to be protected and not to be arraigned, and I will not assign the reasons on which I founded my judgment."

He did not think that the power to dismiss a Judge gave any right to approve or condemn his conduct. In 1834 Mr. O'Connell moved for a Committee to inquire into the conduct of Baron Smith, for the purpose of his removal from the Bench, and the Government of the day agreed to support the proposal on the condition that that part of the Motion which related to the dismissal of the Baron should be dropped. In the debate which took place on the subject, the late Sir Robert Peel said, that—

“If—on light and frivolous complaints, nay, on plausible allegations of inadvertency or error—Select Committees of the House of Commons are to be appointed for the purpose of examining into the conduct of the Judges, or if those Judges may be dragged before such tribunals, you may fill your Statute Book with laws professing to secure their independence, but their independence is a hollow and a miserable phantom. . . . You must feel and know that the authority of the Judge is extinguished the moment that he is summoned before you as a suspected and accused Minister of Justice; not only is his individual character gone, but the blow you aim at him strikes at the independence and authority of the judicial station.”—[3 Hansard, xxi. 304-6.]

But, notwithstanding that eloquent appeal, the Motion was agreed to. Only a week intervened, however, before the feeling became so strong that the Opposition moved to rescind the vote. Sir James Scarlett, a leading authority, said—

“If the Motion were carried, all the Judges in Ireland must lose their confidence; and if they had any independence, they would all resign.”—[Ibid. 318.]

Mr. Shaw also expressed the matter extremely well on the 21st of February when he said—

“If the conduct of a Judge could be inquired into with any other view than to address the Crown for his removal, then he would say that the independence of the Judicial Bench was a mockery; and the statute of George III. was no better than waste paper. . . . A prima facie case sufficient to justify the removal of Baron Smith from the Bench ought to be made out before the House could proceed with the inquiry.”—[Ibid. 713.]

Sir Robert Peel spoke again, being even more eloquent than he was on a former occasion—

“He denied the wisdom—the prudence—the justice—of arraigning a Judge, unless upon some charge of personal corruption—of gross and grievous neglect of duty, warranting his removal from the Bench. . . . They had not grounds to address the Crown for his removal. Was it fitting that they should attach a label of partial infamy round the neck of this high officer of justice, and then send him to administer the law to others? . . . If they felt in their heart and conscience that he must still continue in the administration of the trust—was it not in the public interest that he should stand apart, not only in the consciousness of innocence, but in the possession of the public esteem and respect? To appoint a Committee was evading the law . . . because if the Judge was a man of honour, and if the House implied the slightest censure against him, his own sense of propriety would tell him that he could no longer remain effective as a Judge.”—[Ibid. 744.]

These were the feelings of English statesmen 40 years ago; but we had fallen very far from that language when a Secretary of State could screw himself up to say that he had a perfect right to interfere with the administration of justice, and to indicate the grounds on which he would dismiss a Judge, although he confessed that as a matter of policy he had better not trench on the administration of justice except in very extreme cases. There was a statute called Burke's Act, passed in 1782, by which Colonial Governors were empowered to remove Judges, the latter being allowed an appeal to the Queen in Council. India was not included in that statute solely because it was not one of the plantations or settlements of the Crown at the time. Could it be argued that because merely by that accident India was not included, her Judges were to be placed in the position of being liable to removal at the arbitrary will of the Governor General? We had chosen to assume the enormous trust of the government of India. We could not give the Natives self-government; but though we were compelled to govern them by arbitrary power, we might give them what was the greatest check against arbitrary power—namely, a pure and independent administration of justice. It was impossible to maintain the position which had been taken up in regard to this matter. There was only one mode of getting free of the question—namely, by placing the Indian Judges in some way or another at least upon a level with the Judges in our Colonies, so that they could not be moved without having the power of appealing to Her Majesty in Council, and to retract the argument that because these Judges held their positions during the pleasure of the Crown, therefore the Governor General, who was the deputy of the Crown, should have the power of controlling and removing them. He had brought this subject forward, not in the least with a view of making an attack on the Government or on his noble Friend the Secretary of State, but because he was overwhelmed and crushed by the magnitude of the question, which had been so lightly and inconsiderately raised, and, in his opinion, so improperly decided.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, although he was not able to follow the constitutional arguments of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe), yet, as he had been a Judge of the High Court for some years, and had also governed a province in India, he might be permitted to state his experience with regard to the question before the House. The real point involved was that, not of turning out Judges, but of criticising their conduct. In India we had adopted a despotic government, but we might check the exercise of despotic power by setting up a tribunal which should be above the Government, and which should do justice to the people of India. Such a tribunal was set up in the last century, and was called the Supreme Court. It soon became apparent that a very high view of its judicial functions could not be maintained. A scandal arose, and it was found necessary to clip its wings, and, as a matter of fact, its power was reduced to very narrow limits. Its jurisdiction was made a personal jurisdiction of a very limited character, and it was expressly precluded by Parliament from interfering in any manner concerning the revenue of India. That, then, was a Court confined within very strict limits in its jurisdiction. But side by side with it there existed a much greater Court, with wider functions, the jurisdiction of which extended over all India—a Court which was independent of the Government, according to the system established by Warren Hastings and Lord Cornwallis, while the Sudder Courts were appointed by the Government, and exercised their functions under its control. He might compare its position to that of the English Lord Chancellor, who did not hold office by a tenour independent of the Government, but who at the same time exercised his judicial functions without any reference to the Ministry. A few years ago it was thought proper to combine the two Courts, and to form a single Court which should unite the functions of both. The Legislature considered that it would be quite impossible to give it a position so entirely independent as that of the Supreme Court; and, when that Court was constituted, claimed for itself several very large powers of control which it had not before possessed. There was, for instance, a complete power of legislating for the High Court, the Judges of which, unlike those of the Supreme Court, were in many ways under the control of the Government, though they enjoyed much judicial independence. The result of his experience, after seeing both sides of the shield, was that their position was well understood, and that there was no imputation on their independence as Judges, though they might be liable to removal as officials. They were in no respects open to suspicion, and if they ever displayed any bias in a case in which the Crown was involved, it was almost invariably against the Government. That being their position, it was only natural that from their very independence errors would sometimes occur, or even scandals. But their jurisdiction was limited and checked in various ways. There was an almost unbounded power of appeal, and facilities not only for reviewing judgments, but even for new legislation to an extent unknown in this country. Under their peculiar circumstances, if once it were known that there was a power wholly independent of the Government, it would be necessary to double the Army. A great part of our dominion in India depended on what was called our prestige—that was, a belief in the irresistible power of the Government. It was necessary, if India was to be well administered, that the Natives should be impressed by contact with a solid and uncontrollable power, and therefore no Courts of Law could be wholly independent of the Government. No doubt, it was not likely that Judges would ever have to be actually removed for misbehaviour, but the Government could not do without the power of doing so if necessary. That was a matter of theory, but in that case the Secretary of State was justified in saying that a Judge's conduct might be criticized as though he were an English Judge. But the real question was whether criticism was to be confined to extra-judicial acts or not. He was very ready to accept the view that the judicial acts of the Judges ought to be independent of the Government; but he was inclined to believe it desirable that a distinction should be drawn between judicial and extra-judicial acts. His own opinion agreed very much with the view expressed by Sir Erskine Perry in Council when he said that the real question was not whether the Government had a right to censure the decision of the Supreme Court of Justice or to punish inferior Judges for judicial indiscretions, but whether the Government had displayed a wise discretion, and whether they had treated Mr. Leeds, the magistrate, with justice. That view appeared to him not inconsistent with the principle laid down by the Secretary of State, that the Executive, in trenching on the domain of the Judges in the exercise of their judicial functions, could only be justified by extreme necessity. Although the right hon. Gentleman who had brought this subject before the House had not gone into the details of the Fuller case, yet, as that case had given rise to this discussion, it was right to touch upon it. He wished to apply to the Fuller case the principle he had laid down—that, though the ultimate power must lie with the Executive, that power should not be exercised except in cases of extreme necessity. In his opinion the Fuller case was not such a case. The action of the Government had been to force the magistrates to deal with a certain class of cases in a particular way, in some respect contrary to the opinion of the High Court, and he thought they had improperly censured the High Court. The ground on which the Government founded the necessity for interference was that this was not an isolated case, but one of several in which very insufficient sentences had been passed. He believed that was so, and that there was occasion for a remedy. But the proper remedy was not to censure the Judges, but to amend the law. According to the penal code of India at present, if one man struck another with the intention of killing him it was homicide, but if he had no such intention, even if death should result it was not homicide. This was a case in which it was perfectly certain there was no intention of killing, and therefore, according to the law, the offence was not homicide. He believed the law was bad, because the fear that a blow might lead to homicide prevented many homicides. It was not the fault of the magistrates that they were obliged to follow it. But there was a great difficulty when we came to deal with European British subjects, who up to 1872, when an Act was passed in which he had a considerable share, were a privileged class above the law. Having had until lately the privileges of a superior conquering race, now that they were subjected to the law we must be very careful that the law was not strained to punish them; for, after all, there was a very strong public opinion in India brought to bear upon magistrates, who must not be forced to strain the law. It was said by the Government that if there was any doubt about the Fuller case the magistrate ought to have sent it to a higher Court. But, having great experience in such matters, he must say that was not the practice in India. The practice was that a man was not to be committed to a higher Court for trial unless the magistrate was satisfied there was evidence to convict him. In this case there was no such evidence, and therefore he thought the magistrate was right in the conclusion he had come to. There was a strong feeling in India that it was necessary to restrain Europeans from violence against the Natives, and therefore it should be made clear that no such violence would be permitted. At the same time, he would say that it was a great injustice to the administrators of the law, to the Government, and to the Civil Service of India, high and low, to suppose that there was any disposition on their part to ill-use the Natives. They had, on the other hand, a most earnest desire to protect the Natives, and any allegation to the contrary was a most unfair accusation, not justified by the facts. In this case, however, the magistrate might have failed to award adequate punishment to the offender; it certainly could not be said that he had been actuated by any unfair prejudice in favour of a European British subject. In fact, Mr. Fuller was not a European; he was what was generally called an East Indian. He was glad to observe that since the visit of the Prince of Wales to India there was an increased disposition to treat the Natives kindly, and he hoped that would continue to be the case; but in doing justice to the Natives they must be careful to do justice to their own servants, who were administering the government of a great Dependency far away and under great difficulties. They ought to be treated fairly and considerately in a case like this; where the law was doubtful it should be made clear, and any failure in administration ought not to be attributed to any real misconduct on the part of the magistrate.

MR. FAWCETT strongly sympathized with the Secretary of State for India, and if this Motion were pressed to a division he should support his policy; but, as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) had distinctly impugned the conduct of the Secretary of State, it seemed without precedent that no reply should be given to the two important speeches which had just been delivered. He could not take on himself the responsibility of defending the Government; but he appealed to the Treasury Bench, in justice to the House and to India, to say what they had to allege by way of defending the policy of the Secretary of State. If that were not done, the impression that would be produced in India would be that the Government had absolutely nothing to say in defence of his policy. A more clear, distinct, concise, and emphatic declaration of policy than that contained in the despatch alluded to had never been published in a Parliamentary Blue Book; and it was due to the importance of the subject that some defence should be made from the Treasury Bench of the policy which had been impugned.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he had certainly intended, with the permission of the House, to offer some remarks on this subject; but he thought it would have been better if some of the other Gentlemen who were going to speak had preceded him. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) had drawn the attention of the House to much antiquarian and interesting matter; but he would have been wiser to have applied himself to the question before the House, which related to an actual case of recent date, to which attention was first drawn by the Indian Press. He (the Solicitor General) understood that one reason for Mr. Leeds's judgment was, among other things, that Fuller was not a European, and that it was very improbable that a European would so behave. [Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he was an East Indian of European extraction.] The case was brought before the magistrate on the allegation that Fuller had caused the death of his servant by an act of unlawful violence. Fuller was waiting for his carriage, being about to go to church on Sunday, and on his servant for whom he was waiting coming up he inflicted the violence. The servant almost immediately afterwards fell to the ground and died. That was the state of the facts when the case came before Mr. Leeds. On the inquiry four witnesses were examined. Three of them stated that they saw Mr. Fuller kick the deceased in the stomach, and it was proved that death resulted from rupture of the spleen. One witness—the coachman—did not contradict the evidence of the other three, but stated that he had not seen Mr. Fuller kick the deceased. It was true, as the hon. Member (Sir George Campbell) had said, the Indian penal code did not determine the degree of criminality to be greater in the case of the death of an assaulted person than a mere assault, if there was no intention to kill, and Mr. Leeds treated this as a common assault. And now what was the error of Mr. Leeds? He took on himself to decide that the true character of the offence was simply a pulling of the hair and the striking a slight blow, and that therefore he was entitled, according to the Indian penal code, to disregard the fact of death. He made two mistakes. In the first place, he seemed to have assumed, what was contrary to all rules of evidence, that the fact that one witness out of four did not see what the other three independent witnesses had deposed to necessarily derogated from their evidence; and, in the second place, whether this was a serious case of manslaughter, or only an ordinary common assault, ought not to have been decided by himself. Mr. Leeds should have remitted the case to a superior tribunal, where it would have been decided by a Judge and jury. A similar question might arise before any stipendiary magistrate in London in the event of a charge of wounding being brought before him. Suppose in such a case, where four witnesses had sworn that they had seen a knife in the hands of the accused and had heard him use threats towards the injured party, the magistrate took upon himself to decide the question and to treat it as a common assault, punishable with a small fine.

If the magistrate took such a course he would very properly receive a rebuke from the Secretary of State; and yet it was said that by administering a similar rebuke in India there had been an invasion of the jurisdiction and of the independence of the Indian Courts of Justice. If the view which some persons had taken of this matter were correct, every magistrate would be placed upon exactly the same footing as the Lord Chief Justice of England. No such position of independence occupied by a magistrate was recognized by either the law or the practice of this country. The independence referred to by the right hon. Member for the University of London was confined to certain great officers who were entrusted with the performance of particular functions. Turning to what had subsequently happened in this matter, it was clear that Mr. Leeds had made a great mistake. That gentleman had made the excuse that he believed it to be prima facie improbable that a European would kick his servant in the way described. If they were dealing with probabilities, for his own part he should have thought it highly improbable that a European gentleman would pull his servant's hair or strike him on the head, and therefore he was unable to appreciate the subtle distinction which had been drawn between probabilities in the case of Mr. Leeds. Then, again, Mr. Leeds said that there were no external marks of violence on the deceased. It was, however, alleged that the cause of death was a kick on the stomach, causing rupture of the spleen. Now, a kick on the soft part of the stomach would most likely leave no marks of external violence, and therefore the reasoning of Mr. Leeds was open to considerable objection. He did not desire to be too hard on that gentleman's reasons for the decision at which he had arrived; but it appeared to him that in a case of alleged violence to a Native by a European, it became of the utmost importance that the Government of a country like India should teach the subject-races that those who occupied the superior position and possessed the education of Europeans were not allowed to abuse those advantages by behaving tyrannically to the Natives, and they would have been neglecting their duty if they had not by every means in their power sought to enforce that principle.

The Solicitor General

What did the Government of India do? They called the attention of the High Court to the circumstances of the case. And here he wished to point out that the strangest misapprehension as to what they had done had arisen. The High Court, besides its judicial functions, exercised functions of superintendence over inferior tribunals of an Executive character and the appeal made by the Government to the High Court involved the exercise of the latter to the entire exclusion of the former. Much misapprehension had arisen in consequence of these two distinct functions of the High Court being confused together. It seemed to be thought that all that the High Court had power to do was to have brought up the case to their own Court, and then to have increased the sentence, which they could only have done upon the hypothesis that the offence charged was of a graver character than that of an assault. The complaint made was not that the sentence passed was too high; but that Mr. Leeds, instead of doing what he ought to have done and remitting the case to a higher tribunal, had improperly taken upon himself to adjudicate upon it. It was this conduct on the part of Mr. Leeds that had led the Government to appeal to the Executive functions of the High Court. Those functions, which they had derived from the old Sudder Court, had cast upon them the duty of rebuking and of calling in question the conduct of the magistrates and of the other judicial functionaries throughout India; and, therefore, it was their duty in the case now under the notice of the House to have rebuked Mr. Leeds for his conduct in taking upon himself to determine a matter which he should have remitted to a higher tribunal for decision. It was the failure of the High Court to take that step and to exercise its Executive functions in this respect that had led to the Governor General of India calling their attention to the matter. To this communication from the Governor General the High Court returned the somewhat curt answer, that in their view there was nothing in the sentence that had been passed to call for particular observation. But that was not the question which was raised by the Governor General. The High Court appeared throughout this discussion to have assumed that there was only one course open to them in the matter, and that was to treat the case as if it had been brought before them on appeal. It was a mistake to assume that that position had ever been taken by the Governor General. The point raised by the Governor General throughout had been, that the conduct of Mr. Leeds had been such as to warrant the Natives in thinking that, as the accused was a European, Mr. Leeds had chosen to treat it as a trumpety assault, when, if the case made out by the evidence of four witnesses was to be accepted as accurate, it was one of a somewhat bad manslaughter; the only ground for disbelieving their evidence being—first, that one witness did not see what they stated occurred; and, secondly, the probabilities of the case. It was a great pity that this controversy had ever arisen. But it was a controversy which had been rashly invoked by the High Court themselves, in consequence of their declining to exercise their functions of superintendence over an inferior tribunal, and of claiming for themselves absolute independence, not as regarded the exercise of their judicial functions, but of that of their Executive functions; and their doing so had given rise to this dispute, which both he and the Secretary of State for India deeply lamented should have arisen. It was necessary for the Secretary of State for India either to admit, or deny this claim, and he was quite justified in assuming the right to criticize, and even, if necessary, to censure the conduct of these judicial authorities. Without undervaluing the authority of the right hon. Gentleman, he must frankly say that he could not concur in the opinion he had expressed. What was really the matter to be discussed was the Act of 1861, which made the tenure of the Judges of India “during the pleasure of the Crown.” Those words were not used unadvisedly. Now, if any question arose as to any judicial or other office, the first question put by a lawyer was whether it was held during pleasure, or during good behaviour. It was enough to say that it was the deliberate view and intention of Parliament that the Judges in India should hold their offices during pleasure. But so far from accepting this position, the Judges of the High Court claimed to be in exactly the same position as the Judges in England. That being so, what was the principle on which the policy or impolicy of such a system ought to be decided? It would be admitted that it might be unadvisable to make the Judges of some of our Colonial dependencies perfectly independent. Even at home some checks had been found necessary; and in 1861, an Act had been passed to take away the independence of coroners, and to make them responsible to the Lord Chancellor for the time being. Who were the Judges of the High Court? What functions did they exercise? And how were they to be made responsible? He submitted that, as a matter of fact, they were under the jurisdiction of the Executive Government, and that, as a matter of policy, they ought so to be. Was it without meaning that they held office during pleasure, according to the recommendation of the Commission, and that the Governor General was entitled to remove them, subject to the pleasure of the Crown? The right hon. Gentleman would not contest that they were liable to be removed. They presided over Courts under circumstances where they were liable to no other check than that of the Executive Government. Every act done by that Government and by the Secretary of State for India was subject to the review of Parliament, and to the action of public opinion at home. The High Court had jurisdiction over 30,000,000 of people. It was composed of five members, only two of whom had received a legal education. It had a Bar of 10 persons practising before it. There was only one newspaper published there, and no considerable European population existed. For such a body to claim to be absolutely independent of all check and control was claiming more than the Judges at home, because in this country, where all manner of checks existed, the Judges were responsible to Parliament, and might be removed on the Address of both Houses. In India the Legislative Council was prohibited from discussing anything but a Bill that was before it; and the only way in which this question could have been raised in the Council would have been by a Bill for the removal of the Judge. The Council was not like the House of Commons, which could discuss all topics of interest to the public, and there was no other institution to act as a check upon the most absolute tyranny practised by persons in the position of Judges. When the question was put and the Government was invited to express its opinion whether these Judges were as independent as the Judges in this country, or rather more so, it became necessary, as a matter of policy, to consider what position they held. Here we had the Press and the Bar; no one could over-value the benefit which accrued to the State from the active and vigilant observance of the conduct of the Judges by a Bar able and willing to make any complaint against misconduct or oppression; and the Press gave publicity to all judicial proceedings in every kind of Court. What a contrast between India and this country! And yet it was proposed to give the High Court of India an independence which was not enjoyed by any Judge in this country. The Privy Council took no cognizance of Indian criminal cases, and with no Bar, no Press, and no European public opinion within hundreds of miles, these Indian Judges, freed from responsibility, owing no obedience, and resenting anything like criticism on their conduct, would enjoy an absolute independence which would not be conducive to the interests of India, and would encourage the Natives to believe that our one object in being there was simply to get all we could. He was not suggesting that any one of these Judges had been guilty of misconduct; but it was known as a fact that in the administration of justice Judges had been known to say that they would not believe the oath of a Native, and one Judge had been heard to use words which, if not at once checked by the Executive, would have thrown India into a blaze of revolution; and was it to be allowed that, in such a condition of things the Judges were to be allowed to exercise a jurisdiction subject to no check whatever? He regretted that the question should have been challenged at all; but when the question was raised and the Governor General and the Secretary of State were asked—"Do you concede to us that we are absolutely independent and are entitled not to be criticized by the proper Executive authorities?" only one answer could have been returned—namely, that they must be subject to the criticism of the Executive, for there was no other; but that they might rely upon its not being exercised rashly, or inconsiderately, especially as it would itself be exercised under the supervision of the British Parliament, and if anything improper or oppressive was done a remedy could easily be found in the censure of the Minister.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, he agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman in feeling deep sympathy with the Governor General of India and the Secretary of State in their endeavours to secure full justice to the Natives. There were portions of the Minute of the Governor General claiming full justice for the Natives of India, in which every Englishman would fully and entirely concur. So far as the policy pursued with regard to the magistrate who had tried this particular case was concerned, he (Sir Henry James) took no exception to what had fallen from the Solicitor General. He admitted that the Governor General was entitled to criticize the conduct of Members of the Supreme Court, though whether that would be an Executive or a judicial function might be open to doubt. Lords Salisbury and Lytton regarded it as Executive; but, supposing it to be judicial, the most that could be said would be that the two had been confounded, and the matter would not call for discussion, because no one would censure a Minister for such a mistake. Having, in his first despatch, approved the policy of Lord Lytton in the Fuller and Leeds cases, in the second, Lord Salisbury proceeded to answer the demand made upon him to define the position of the members of the Supreme Court. In this purely speculative despatch he laid down what was the position of the Judges in relation, not only to this case, but also to all others; and it was to the principle embodied in the despatch that he took exception. The hon. and learned Gentleman had not dealt with this despatch, to which the terms of the Motion were directed. The definition that was given affected not only Judges in India, but every Judge that held office at the will of the Crown, for the same words in an Act of Parliament could not have a different meaning in different Colonies; and, if the definition given were correct, it would be binding upon every Governor in every Colony and dependency where there were Judges holding office at the will of the Crown, and would justify each Governor in acting according to his own discretion. It was this that made the question so serious. If the House of Commons thought it right to say, that which his hon. and learned Friend had not ventured to say—namely, that they agreed with Lord Salisbury—of course the responsibility would rest with them; but he trusted that either from the Secretary of State himself, or some other Member of the Government, there would come an acknowledgment that the terms of that despatch could not be supported. Of course, if a Judge flagrantly misconducted himself, or was manifestly unfit for office, he ought to be removed; but the position taken up by Lord Salisbury appeared to him to be unconstitutional, inasmuch as he claimed the right for the Executive Government to interfere with the Judges in the exercise of their purely judicial functions, though he limited that interference to extreme cases. In so speaking of Lord Salisbury's despatch, he (Sir Henry James) was not carping at words, but merely reproducing the sense of a passage which could not be explained away. In the same despatch Lord Salisbury declared that the right to dismiss any person holding office carried with it the right to indicate conduct which might, if persisted in, incur dismissal, or, in other words, the right to approve or condemn the action of the officer who was liable to be dismissed. Now, he (Sir Henry James), whilst admitting the full right of the Executive to dismiss a Judge for misconduct or unfitness, protested against the proposition that the power to dismiss gave also the power to approve, sanction, or condemn. Some hon. Members who considered the question in a perfunctory way, might feel disposed to support Lord Salisbury on the ground that the Home Secretary interfered with magistrates. But, in the present instance, the House had to deal with Judges appointed under the Patent of the Crown, which entirely altered the case. Besides, he very much doubted whether the power exercised by the Home Secretary was at all of the same nature as that which the Indian Government claimed. If it was necessary, as a matter of policy, that there should be a power of interference given to the Executive, it ought to be done by legislation. But at present this was a question of a constitutional right. These Indian Judges were appointed by the Crown under the Act of 1861, and were to hold office at the will of the Crown; and the meaning of the words "at the will of the Crown" was well defined by the Constitution. It was necessary to consider the history of the position of the Judges prior to the usurpations of the Stuarts. That history, he thought, was not very clearly to be found anywhere. Hallam said that before the time of James I. the office was held "during good behaviour;" but he failed to find the authority on which that statement was made, and he was inclined to think it ought to have been "at the will of the Crown." After Magna Charta there was always the greatest jealousy shown that the Judges should be able to fulfil the promise given in it, that justice should not be sold or denied. As early as the reign of Edward III. the oath administered to a Judge was that he—

"shall indifferently administer justice to all men, as well foes as friends, that shall have any suit or plea before him, and this he shall not forbear to do though the King by his letters or by express word of mouth shall command the contrary."

In the same reign, the principle that the Crown should not interfere with the Judges in their judicial functions was laid down in a statute, and there were many other statutes to the same effect. In one case it was enacted that penalties should be inflicted on the Judges if they listened to the commands of the Crown. It was not till the time of the Stuarts that the Sovereign claimed a right of interference. The hon. and learned Gentleman (the Solicitor General), who was as well versed in Constitutional history as any Member of the House, must feel a pride not only as a lawyer, but as an Englishman, when he thought of the protests that were made against the usurpations that were attempted in those times. When James I. asked merely that the delivery of a judgment might be postponed, Chief Justice Coke refused to give him a promise that he would delay, even for a day, the exercise of his judicial functions. In supporting the claim of the King, Bacon admitted that, as between subject and subject, there was no right of interference, and maintained merely that the right existed in matters in which the prerogatives of the Crown was attacked. In the case of the Indian Judges there was a general right of interference claimed, and that went far beyond the worst claims of the Stuarts. There might be a feeling of sympathy with Lord Salisbury and Lord Lytton in their endeavours to see full justice accorded to the Natives of India; but was a consideration of that description sufficient to warrant interference with the Judges by any Governor General or any Executive in the exercise of their purely judicial functions? Policy had been spoken of; but in relation to the aspect of the question, was it not fatal to say that the Natives were not to have anyone standing between them and an arbitrary Government? It might be necessary that the Executive Government of India should be carried on with some degree of arbitrariness; there had been Governors General in India who had exercised arbitrary powers towards the Natives, and there might be such Governor Generals in the future. Well, were they to be allowed to send directions to the Judges as to how they were to administer the law? He knew that it was not only the European community in India who were shocked at the despatch of Lord Salisbury, but also the intelligent Natives, who never knew in what position they would be placed if the independence of the Judges were assailed, and who were as anxious as the Europeans for that independence. They had protested against the despatch, and were most anxious that the independence of the Judges from the Executive should be secured. They knew that those Judges were, for the most part, men of superior acquirements; that they were men who went out from England to India without prejudice; and that they were men of independent character. When Natives were made Judges it was a proof to them that we gave Natives some part in the administration of justice, and placed them, to some extent, upon an equality with ourselves. The Native Judges had many great attributes. They were quick to learn, intelligent, retentive in memory, and capable of making nice distinctions in legal matters. But there was one defect in them which anybody must recognize—there was a want of independence in them. It might spring from the nature of their Asiatic race, or from the fact that they were a governed, instead of being a governing race. He would ask the Friends of India who talked so much of their desire to assist the Natives of India, what would be the result, if they told a Native Judge that he was to depend on the interference of the Executive Government; that they could censure him, could degrade him, could suspend his pay one day, and could restore it the next. He would be as obedient as possible to the Executive. He would watch the tendency of the Governor General, and act accordingly. This was an important feature of the question, and should not be lost sight of by those who defended interference with the Judicial Bench. In this despatch Lord Salisbury assumed that, wherever there was a power to remove a Judge, there was necessarily a power to approve or condemn his conduct. That, he (Sir Henry James) thought, was a most serious proposition. He took the position of the Executive Government to be, in relation to the Indian Judges, exactly the same as the power of Parliament was in relation to the English Judges. That which Parliament could do the Executive could do, and that which Parliament could not do, the Executive could not do. The position of Judges in India was in all respects as independent as that of Judges in England. So anxious was Parliament at the time to avoid the errors of the Stuarts, that it took from the Crown the power of removing Judges. If good behaviour was dependent on the judgment of the Crown, it was exactly the same thing as being at the will of the Crown. There was an authority which would commend itself to the House generally, and to hon. Members opposite, which laid down that proposition very clearly, and must receive the approbation of everyone. The Duke of Buckingham, who was at the time Colonial Secretary, had to deal in 1868 with the question of the judicial arrangements at Singapore, and he said—

“Her Majesty’s Government are fully alive to the importance, or rather to the paramount necessity, of enabling the Colonial Judges to administer law in all cases which may be brought before them without any prospect or apprehension of direct or indirect interference from the Executive.”

In the time of Lord Althorp a Motion was brought forward to censure one of the Irish Judges. Sir Robert Peel made a most convincing speech against the claim put forward to censure and degrade the Bench, and that Motion was lost by an overwhelming majority. The House had never deviated from that time from the proposition confirmed by the vote on that Motion. In 1872, when the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) brought forward a Motion with respect to the Galway Election Petition and Mr. Justice Keogh, an objection was taken to the form of that Motion, on the ground that it did not speak of the removal of a Judge. The hon. and learned Member at once admitted that he would not take a middle course, because, if Mr. Justice Keogh was fit to be censured, he was not fit to be a Judge. He hoped he had sufficiently guarded himself from being supposed to be making an attack against the intentions of those who had framed this despatch, or even to be criticizing in a hostile spirit the policy which dictated it; but against the wording of that despatch, and the principles contained in it, he felt it his duty to speak as earnestly as he could. The Government need not feel any humiliation in admitting that the terms of that despatch could not be constitutionally justified. Those who had been in office knew how easily mistakes of this kind might be made. Everyone might have to ask forgiveness, and they must give and ask for pardon by turns. This despatch could not be supported, and the Government had not yet been pledged by the Solicitor General to support it. He hoped that the strong hand which tore up the first Fugitive Slave Circular would also tear up this despatch. Even if, for the moment, Lord Salisbury himself would have to say that the despatch could not be supported, he felt sure that the noble Lord would be generous enough, to accept that proposition if he saw that by making the admission he secured the establishment of full constitutional right for the sake of the independence of the Judges of the land.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he would not have put himself forward in this debate if it had not been—what rarely happened to him—he was unable entirely to concur with the views of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James). He was entirely of his hon. and learned Friend's opinion, that in the despatch of Lord Salisbury some indiscreet expressions had been used; yet, on the other hand, the absolute affirmation of identity in the position of the Judges in India and the Judges in England was a position which could not be sustained, and any attempt to enforce it would lead to very great difficulty, and, he might say, to very great danger. The contrast of the absolute assertion made on the one side and the other in this matter reminded him of a celebrated constitutional controversy between Pitt and Fox with reference to the Regency Question. Fox maintained the absolute right of the Prince of Wales to the Regency, while Pitt said the Prince of Wales had no more right to be Regent than any other person. Both these assertions were wholly wrong and unsound. He ventured to think that this debate ought not to be confined to mere technical considerations, but that it had a much larger scope, and it was impossible to apply to India their own sage maxims of constitutional law, however much they might respect them. The question was part of a great controversy, and not merely one of judicial functions; it was a claim on the part of the Civil Service of India to exercise a kind of control over the Executive Government, and he could not believe that this would result in any advantage to the Native population. As the House was aware, the question had been made a lever for an attack upon the Executive, upon Lord Lytton and Lord Salisbury, which he (Sir William Harcourt) believed to be profoundly unjust and exceedingly mischievous; and he hoped it would not go forth that the House of Commons had sided with the violent attack which had been directed by the Civil Service of India against the Governor General and the Secretary of State. He was sure that his hon. and learned Friend would disclaim any such intention; but, unless they took pains to express their opinion clearly, great mischief would arise. He did not wish to say anything offensive to the Civil Service, but he could not overlook the fact that in every dominant race a tendency towards oppression would show itself; and whatever question of constitutional law might be involved, the real controversy was, whether the Executive should or should not hold its strong hand over the Civil Service, and prevent its falling into that besetting sin. The discussion, however, could not be narrowed to that one point. He had listened to the conditions mentioned by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton, and to his speech about the Stuarts, Lord Coke, and Bacon. He fully concurred with him, but failed to see how those matters applied to the particular question. The great offence of the Stuarts was that they tried to apply despotic principles to a free country; but how could any such consideration affect their judgment on the principles which were to govern India? India was not a constitutional country, and though he did not undervalue constitutional principles, he could not accept the proposition that they ought necessarily to underlie the government of all countries. It had been contended that the Judges of India were absolutely as free from control as they were in England, and that no treatment short of dismissal could influence them. But his hon. and learned Friend argued that the conduct of Mr. Leeds was wrong, and that he ought to have been dismissed; in that he could not agree with him, holding that, though his conduct was wrong, the punishment suggested was wrong also. He only wished to point out that the course pursued was not desirable, and a practice so Draconian in its severity would not be beneficial to India. His hon. and learned Friend had said that they could meddle with Judges in England, but not in India; but what did that mean? If the Government in India were to have no control over them, who was to deal with them? Parliament certainly was not to exercise control. Were they going to erect the Judges in India into a power superior to the Executive, superior to the Governor General, superior to the Secretary of State, and superior even to Parliament itself? He had a very high respect for the Judges who were under the control of the public opinion of a free country; but he was not disposed to repose confidence in Judges who were absolutely uncontrolled in the distant regions of the East. There was a tendency in certain quarters to deify a man the moment he was made a Judge, and they were apt to imagine that, from that moment, he was removed from all the vices and faults that belong to human nature. But the fact was—which his hon. and learned Friend seemed to forget—that a Judge was a man, and might commit errors even when he was called a Judge. Why they should suppose that the moment a man became a Judge he was fit to be entrusted with absolute, uncontrolled power he could not understand. He was an enemy to all forms of despotism, and this would be the most dangerous, oppressive, and mischievous of all. What did they mean by a despotic Government? They meant that the Executive was supreme. What did they mean by constitutional Government? They meant that the government was restrained by Parliament and by public opinion. The question, then, was—Did they, or did they not, admit that India was despotically governed? If they said that India was constitutionally governed, he would admit all that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton had said; but if they admitted that India was despotically governed, then the analogy which had been drawn between India and a Constitutional Government was altogether inapplicable. They were told they must have the Constitutional Judge to stand between the Executive and the Natives of India; but why were they to assume that the Judges would stand between the Executive and the Natives? The Judges themselves were members of the dominant caste—the most distinctive element of that dominant caste—and what was the power which alone could and would be disposed to stand between the Judiciary and the Natives? It was the Executive Government in India, which had the great advantage of being short-service men—men who had come from England fresh with the instincts of a free country, without the prejudices which belonged to the dominant class; they were the most likely to stand between the Judiciary and the Natives. He attached great importance to the principle of short service and to the fact that the men went out fresh, as it had been said, from a bath of liberty in England. They went to India with the principles that actuated England at home; they had not had time, under the enervating influence of the climate, and the still more enervating influence of a dominant class, to forget the principles on which the government of India was founded. They had to deal, no doubt, with a very difficult problem, but they did the best they could; they must try to balance these enormous powers; but he must object to the ere-tion of a despotism which had never yet been known—the despotism of a Judiciary uncontrolled by a Bar, uncontrolled by public opinion, and uncontrolled by the Press. That a man should say—"I am a Judge, I cover myself by that veil, I do what I like, I am not responsible," that was not a system to establish in India; and, without defending every expression used in the despatch, he must say it seemed to him that substantial justice had been done in a matter of immense importance. Absolute and uncontrolled power on the part of the Judges seemed to him incompatible with their rule in India, and he would therefore be no party to passing a censure on the Government of India.

MR. FORSYTH said, no one could be more jealous than he was of the interference of the Executive with the Judges; but, after a careful consideration of the circumstances of the case, he had come to the conclusion that the despatch of the Secretary of State for India was entirely right. The Governor of the North West Provinces had, for his own information, applied to the High Court for their own opinion respecting the propriety of the sentence passed. They should have declined to give any opinion: they, however, replied to the effect that the sentence, though, perhaps, lighter than the Court might be disposed to fix, under the circumstances, did not appear to be especially open to objection. The letter, to which that was an answer, was a semi-official letter, and the opinion expressed in the reply to it was simply an unofficial opinion. The point was not one brought before the High Court in its judicial character. When the question came before the Government of India they used these very mild terms—

"The Governor General in Council cannot but regret that the High Court should have considered that its duties and responsibilities in this matter were adequately fulfilled by the expression of such an opinion."

But it should be remembered that this was not a question brought before the High Court in their judicial capacity. If the High Court was asked to express an informal opinion, surely the Governor General, if he thought that opinion wrong, was justified in saying so? With regard to the general question, he could not put the Judges of the High Court in India precisely on the same footing as the Judges in this country. There was, in the first place, this remarkable difference—that the Judges in this country held office quamdiu se bene gesserint, while the Judges in India held office durante bene placito. In this country the Crown could not dismiss a Judge, except upon an Address from both Houses. But in India there was no House of Commons, nor was there any public functionary or organ which could advise or rebuke a Judge, except the Viceroy; and a milder admonition, with regard to the course which he thought ought to have been pursued in the present case, than that given by the Viceroy could not have been expressed in language. Even in this country, the fact that a Judge could only be removed on an Address by both Houses of Parliament did not prevent the House of Commons from calling in question the conduct of a Judge. For instance, in 1770, Serjeant Glyn moved in the House of Commons for a—

"Committee to inquire into the proceedings of the Judges in Westminster Hall, particularly in cases relating to the liberty of the Press;"

when, in the course of a long debate, the conduct of Chief Justice Mansfield was severely censured by the Mover, and by Dunning and Burke, "while," as Lord Campbell said, "it was stoutly defended by Gray, Attorney General Thurlow, Solicitor General, and Charles Fox." If they in that House might call in question the conduct of a Judge without intending to move an Address, why might not something similar be done in India? He should certainly oppose the Motion if it could be pressed to a division.

MR. HERSCHELL said, they must discuss this question as one wholly independent of the claim set up by the Civil Servants of the Crown, and they must, moreover, consider to what the second despatch of Lord Salisbury would lead if it were carried out to its full extent. His hon. and learned Friend (Sir William Harcourt) had said that the Government of India was a despotic Government, and its treatment must be different from that of a constitutional Government. But surely it was a question, if you were to govern a country despotically, how far you must leave that despotism unchecked, uncontrolled, and unfettered. Was it not desirable to fetter that despotism with some of those checks and safeguards which had been found useful in this country, which was governed constitutionally? Unquestionably, the sentence in this Fuller case was one which came within the judicial discretion of the Judge, if he honestly and fairly exercised that discretion; and however much persons might dispute the expediency of the sentence, there was not anything in it so extravagant as to show that the Judge did not desire to do justice between Natives and men of his own race. Hence the extreme importance of Lord Salisbury's second despatch, which laid down this—that the power of interference and censure on the part of the Executive was a power which ought to be exercised only in cases of extreme necessity. But what did Lord Salisbury mean by "extreme necessity," according to his own interpretation of the words? He meant that in every case in which the Judge exercised discretion it was in the power of the Executive to punish him for the sentence he had pronounced. Admitting that where there was no Parliament the Executive must exercise control, the next point they had to consider was to what extent, and in what direction, was that control to be exercised. When it was urged that Judges in India were free from the popular criticism and control which existed in England, it might be said that the same was true also of the Executive Government in India. The Indian Executive was all-powerful, and not under the same criticism as the English Executive; and, therefore, while there might be danger in leaving the Indian Judges too uncontrolled, there might also be a similar danger in the case of the Indian Executive. He hoped that such a public sentiment was making way in India as would render it less likely now than ever that Englishmen, when dealing judicially with a Native, would deal with him differently from what they would do with a European. But Judges in India were not all of the dominant race; some of them belonged to the subject-race, if so it was to be called; and this fact rendered the despatch the more dangerous, and made it important it should be understood that if those powers were to be exercised in India, which were not exercised in England, they would at least be kept under the strictest and most rigorous control and inspection. If the Executive was to be interfering constantly with the Judiciary, perhaps from over sensitiveness in favour of the Native—for such a thing was possible—it should be remembered that they might have a recoil in the opposite direction, when those who might think the Native had got more than his due would seek to get for the Englishmen perhaps, more than his due. The great object should be to hold the scales fairly between the two classes, and deal with them as if they were both of the same race. They should guard not only against favouring the strong against the weak, but also against favouring the weak against the strong; for as much mischief might be done by the latter as by the former; and it was a remarkable fact that among the earliest warnings given in the Books of Moses to a Judge as to the performance of his duty was this—"Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty." Admitting that there must be the right to dismiss a Judge for misconduct, he asked—was there necessarily involved in that the right, not only to censure him, but to prescribe a course of conduct? Because that was what was implied by the despatch. The next time a man exercised his judicial discretion, there was the danger that he might not act impartially, according to the best of his own judgment, but with an eye to please the authorities of Calcutta. If, excepting in the case of absolute misconduct, the Executive were to point out to a Judge that a certain course of judicial conduct might lead to his dismissal, that would tend to sap the independent judgment of the tribunals. Instead of censuring a particular Judge for giving a particular sentence, the Government, if they had deemed it necessary, could have issued a circular on the subject to Indian magistrates generally.

INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE—ADMISSION OF CANDIDATES.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR rose to call attention to the new regulations in regard to candidates for the Indian Civil Service; and to move—

"That the regulations for the Indian Civil Service fail to fulfil the conditions laid down when it was opened for public competition, 'That the regulations would deal fairly by all parts of the kingdom and all places of liberal education,' inasmuch as they practically exclude the Scotch Universities, the Queen's Colleges, Ireland, and similar institutions in London and the provinces, from participation in the preparation of candidates, either before or after competition; and because they will act injuriously by tending to withdraw youths from public schools at an early age in order to place them under a course of special training for the entrance examinations."

The whole subject was one of great importance, for it involved the future judicial and fiscal administration of the Indian Empire. It was not only of much interest to this country, for these important offices in India had become, by open competition, the inheritance of the whole nation, and not of a class. The influence which it had had upon the education of the middle classes was far from inconsiderable, as it had broadened our idea of school training all over the country. It was necessary to understand the present plan before they could approach the effect of the changes under the new regulations. The existing system was this—Any person might compete for the Civil Service of India between the ages of 17 and 21, and about 250 candidates competed, though only 30 or 40 were passed annually into the Civil Service. After the candidates were entered they became probationers, and received £150 a-year for two years, in order that they might be able to pursue their technical studies, and if they were then successful they could go to India. The change now proposed reduced the maximum age of 21 years to 19, and the candidate could not receive the £150 unless he studied at the University. These were the two changes proposed, and he hoped that Lord Salisbury had not made them without great consideration. His Lordship submitted three questions to the Indian authorities. The first was—"Does the system of open competition answer well, and are you getting good officials under that system?" The unanimous reply from India was in the affirmative, and Lord Salisbury, of course, took no action on that. The second question was—"As it is important for young men to go out early, ought the maximum age to be reduced from 21 to 19?" That was a serious change, which would alter the whole character of preparatory education for the Civil Service in India. Lord Salisbury, in his despatch, said that Indian opinion was divided, because 38 were in favour of raising the age, and 27 for lowering it; and as they were so nearly balanced, he was obliged to act on his own opinion and that of his Council. That, however, was a most inaccurate way of giving the result of his inquiries, because a large proportion were in favour of leaving things as they were. The opinions were asked of 110 persons, including Judges, Members of Council, Governors, and Civil Servants. Of these, 41 were for leaving things as they were; 41 were in favour of raising the age to 22, 13 for making it 20, and 15 in favour of making it 19. So that the result of the whole of the Indian evidence was that 95 were against the age Lord Salisbury had adopted, and only 15 in its favour. So that Lord Salisbury was technically right in saying that Indian opinion was divided, though it was divided into two very unequal parts. But were English authorities in its favour? First of all the Civil Service Commissioners gave the most cogent reasons why the age of 21 should be retained in preference to 19; but Lord Salisbury said that the Universities were in favour of reducing the age to 19. There were 10 Universities in the United Kingdom, but Lord Salisbury only wrote to two, Oxford and Cambridge. Of those, the latter gave no opinion at all; and at Oxford Dr. Liddell said, reduce the age to 19. The other eight Universities were not consulted at all; so that when Lord Salisbury said the Universities were in favour of the change, he meant that Oxford was in its favour, for the other nine gave no opinion at all. He (Mr. Lyon Playfair) believed that this change arose from the double position Lord Salisbury held—he was Secretary of State for India and also Chancellor of Oxford. His Lordship naturally attached great importance to the distinguished University of which he was the head, and so the Chancellor of Oxford, moved by Oxford, reduced the age to 19 to suit Oxford. Oxford, in his opinion, was wise and India foolish, otherwise Oxford would not have prevailed. On the next point Lord Salisbury did go according to Indian opinion. He asked—"Do you attach much importance to University association and training for the men who go out to India?" and the great majority of the India reporters were in favour of that. The fact, however, was, that they were thinking of Haileybury in the olden time, and the esprit de corps which they got there, and which was so valuable. But that was exactly what they would not now get with the maximum age reduced to 19. The result would be that Oxford, with her wealthy University chest, would, as she was already doing, set up an Indian curriculum, with Indian tutors. Cambridge, which, as an University, was less wealthy, but which had rich Colleges, would do the same in probably a less degree. Then, probably, out of 80 probationers of the two years, 40, if not 50, would be supplied by Oxford, 20 by Cambridge, and the remainder would be dribbled in ones and twos over the Scotch, Irish, and the London Universities, Owens College, Manchester, and the Leeds and other Colleges. This might easily have been avoided. Association might be secured by a monopoly given to a single College at Oxford or Cambridge, but disassociation must result from freedom, even for the several Colleges of a single University to participate in the training. That was pointed out clearly by the Civil Service Commissioners, when the scheme was first broached in 1864. They showed that it might produce University feeling, but could not effect the Association of Haileybury. But University training could be had either before or after competition. Up to 1864, the maximum age had been 22, and then Oxford and Cambridge sent two-fifths of the candidates. On the reduction of the age to 21 they ceased to do so to a large extent, because as Undergraduates entered at 19, they could not graduate before 21. This reduction did not operate against the Scotch and Irish Colleges, as they entered students at 17, who could graduate at 20, and either enter the competition directly or go after a special training of six months. For this reason, both Scotland and Ireland sent many more candidates than corresponded to their population. Now, all that Oxford and Cambridge required was either to shorten their curriculum, or to receive Undergraduates intended for competition at an earlier age than at present. That, in fact, was contemplated in the impending reforms for those Universities. All that was necessary would have been to give 500 or 1,000 marks to all men who were B.A.'s from any part of the Kingdom. That would have given a great stimulus to candidates from Oxford and Cambridge, and the other Universities would have had a fair chance also. But Lord Macaulay had insisted on the importance of having general before technical education. That was the experience of all professional training—a good studium generale first and technical training after. On that point, too, Indian opinion was very emphatic. Out of the 110 Indian reporters, no less than 101 said that the two years of probation were wholly required for such technical subjects as English, Anglo-Indian, Hindu, Mahomedan, and Roman Law; Indian History and Geography and Political Economy. But all that was new to Oxford and Cambridge. Their glory was to teach learning for its own sake, and regardless of its appliances, and now, regardless of their peculiar genius, they were going to convert them into mere technical schools. They could only do that also by tempting them with £12,000 of public money to become technical schools with a practical monopoly. This was, moreover, entirely contrary to the principle which the eminent Committee of 1854 laid down for the Civil Service in India. That Committee included Lord Macaulay, Mr. Lefevre, the father of the hon. Member for Reading, and other persons eminent for their knowledge of India, and they took the greatest trouble in forming a scheme. The principle laid down was that no part of the Kingdom and no school should be exclusively set apart for the Civil Service in India, and their rules accordingly dealt fairly with all parts of the Kingdom. The effect of the new scheme, on the contrary, would practically shut out all the Universities except Oxford and Cambridge, as they would not find it worth their while to set up an Indian curriculum with Indian tutors, and that being so Lord Salisbury would very properly not recognize them. The Scotch and Irish Universities, as he had shown, could not compete for the probationers, and they were now shut out from preparing them before competition. Because as their students could only graduate at 20, they could not now send students as before between 17 and 19. It was clear that candidates must now begin their special preparation at 15 or 16, a year before they could even enter the Universities. But what did Lord Salisbury himself say as to the effect of Scotch Universities on the history of our Indian Empire? His words were—

“It was undoubted that most of the great men to whom the Indian Empire was owing were Scotchmen, and that the Scotch Universities had done a noble work in preparing the Civil Servants for the administration of India.”

Then why exclude them for the future? Another effect of the change which he objected to was that it offered great facilities to the rich and shut out the poor. Hitherto the Scotch and Irish Universities had been remarkably successful in sending out poor men. But neither Scotland nor Ireland had great public schools like England, and it was owing to their Universities that poor men could get a good education. But in the future these could be of no use as regarded our Indian Empire to the poor inhabitants of those countries. It was a mistake, however, to suppose that the English public schools would be benefited by the new regulations. He had no doubt that it had been thought in the India Office that Eton, Harrow, Rugby, and other of our great schools would be able to send up men direct, but they had not been able to do so; the crammers had been able to beat them entirely, and they would do so in future. He had Lord Salisbury's authority for saying that the crammers must in the end win and remain masters, both of the schools and the Universities. To take a boy away from school and all his early associations, to deprive him of his best years of bright boyhood, and to place him in the hands of a crammer, was one of the most deplorable results of these new regulations. Lord Salisbury and his Council were, no doubt, much influenced in their change by the terrors that London was a bad and dangerous place for the training of probationers. The professed “moral responsibility” of Oxford and Cambridge had charms for him. He would not believe the Civil Service Commissioners when they said they had ascertained no evils of a London residence. Their words ought to be before the House—

“Further reflection and observation have tended to confirm the Commissioners in the belief that young men who have already given the best proof of steadiness and self-control by success in an arduous Commission, a system under which they are left free to choose for themselves the place and manner of their studies, is a better preparation for the perfect liberty which they are so soon to enjoy in India than any supervision that the discipline of a College could supply.”

If there were any real dangers in a London residence, the new Regulations would increase them tenfold, because in future they were likely to apply to the great proportion of the 250 candidates who come up to the London Special Trainers, and not only to the few probationers. For by the new system they brought boys to London at a very much younger age, before they had attained any stability, and when the perils of London would be infinitely greater to them. But had London done such harm in the past? The Civil Service Commissioners stated in their Report that they had never had to refuse a certificate of good conduct to a probationer. He wanted to know what were the recommendations by which this change was supported? He had shown that they did not come from India—indeed, that Indian opinion was against the change. His complaint was best summed up in the terms of the Resolution of which he had given Notice; but which the Forms of the House prevented him from moving.

MR. HERMON protested in the strongest manner against the important business of the evening—namely, the consideration of Votes in Supply—Votes which the Government stood in need of if they were to avoid national bankruptcy—being interfered with, if not wholly thrown aside, by no fewer than 35 Motions. The right hon. Gentleman had devoted a great deal of time to this question, and he had delivered an able and interesting speech, and he wished the speech had been made on some night when the House was not asked to vote money. He hoped the money would be voted that night, and that the Estimates would not be deferred to a late period of the Session, when there would be no opportunity for discussing them.

MR. ANDERSON pointed out that the complaint of the hon. Member for Preston, that Supply was delayed by these Motions, was not well founded, it having been the immemorial practice of the House to discuss grievances before Supply, and the Government having through a recent concession the power to take as many Mondays as they pleased for the Estimates, when only grievances pertaining to those particular estimates could be brought up. His right hon. Friend had been deprived, by the action of the Government, from bringing on the Motion the last time it was on the Paper, and therefore Government could not complain of his doing it now. His right hon. Friend's able speech had been thrown away, for not only was he unable to take a division upon the subject, but very few of his Colleagues upon the front Opposition Bench had been present to support him, and six out of the seven or eight Members of the Ministry present had been fast asleep the whole time, and yet the speech was one well worthy of attention, but a debate always fell flat if a division could not be taken on it. The right hon. Gentleman had exposed the extremely insidious plan which had been devised by the Secretary of State for India who was the head of Oxford University, and who nominally in the interests of India had adopted a plan which was really prejudicial to India and would do no good to anybody except the University of Oxford. It was, in fact, an insidious plan for benefiting Oxford at the expense of all the other Universities and Colleges in the Kingdom.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Playfair), in his otherwise fair speech, had made one observation which seemed to be quite uncalled for, and it was that the duties of Secretary of State for India and Chancellor of the University of Oxford were incompatible. He also insinuated, as did also the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), that Oxford, and Oxford alone, owing to his noble Friend's position as Chancellor of that University, was to get the benefit of the changes referred to. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had thought it right to impute such motives to a Minister of the Crown. What the Secretary of State had mainly to consider was the interests of the Indian Civil Service. When Lord Salisbury came into office the system of competitive examination had been in existence for some time. It was, however, represented to him that the present system of training through which all candidates after competition had to pass was not the best that could be devised. Lord

Salisbury took opinions on the subject, and an overwhelming preponderance of representations came to him from India that the association of candidates after they had passed their examination would be most desirable. Under the former system every candidate was obliged to live in London for two years. He had no doubt that, on the whole, they behaved very well; but he would appeal to the parents of young men to say whether, if they had sons between 18 and 21, they would like under such circumstances to turn them loose in London for two years with the knowledge that the only control exercised over them during that period would be a periodical examination? Lord Salisbury kept the system of competitive examination intact; but he found that the only way to obtain the advantages of association was to induce the young men to go to the University. It was then necessary that the limits of age should be reduced, and the Secretary of State reduced the maximum age from 17 to 19, instead of 21. He accordingly laid down the rule that they must go to some College—giving a broad and liberal interpretation to the selection—and he said that only those who complied with this condition should have the allowance of £150 a-year, now given to them during their period of probation. It was never intended that this rule should exclude either the Irish or Scotch candidates. Dublin University had not protested against this arrangement, nor had he heard that either the Queen's Colleges or the Scotch Universities had been prevented from sending up their quota for the competitive examinations. There were probably certain institutions to which young men went at certain ages, and they might be affected by the new limits of age; but it was an entire delusion to suppose that the reduction of age would affect the candidates who came up from the Scotch Universities. He believed that the great majority of them left their Universities under the age of 19. The real complaint against the proposed alteration on the part of the Scotch Universities was that candidates would not be able to take their degrees previous to passing the competitive examination by which they could alone become eligible for the Indian Civil Service. He repeated, that what the India Office had to think of was the interest and convenience of the Civil Service, and the majority of the India Council agreed with the Secretary of State in thinking that association was absolutely necessary for these young men. If this association could only be accomplished by reducing the age, the Secretary of State was bound to do what was best for India, even if it affected the interests of some Educational institutions. The scheme had not yet come into operation; but if it were found to be attended with prejudicial results, it would be proper and opportune on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to point out its disastrous effects. At present, to speak of such results, was prophetic anticipation. The best consideration had been given to the Regulations, which it was believed would operate beneficially, and which were not intentionally framed to exclude either Scotchmen or Irishmen. If in their operation they were found to have such an effect, representation of the fact would be listened to, and such alterations made as would remedy the evil.

MR. W. E. FORSTER acknowledged that in troubling the House with any remarks on that occasion he did so on personal grounds, because he was connected with one of the Scotch Universities—namely, that of Aberdeen, and he had had an opportunity of finding out what sort of men went to Scotch Universities, and, in his opinion, the hard work they had there fitted them for service to their country afterwards. That being so, they had to consider what was the effect of this Minute on those men. The noble Lord had said that they were not affected at all. They were affected very much indeed. The noble Lord said that they might get their education before they were 19; but at the present moment they passed their degrees at the University first, and then came up for examination. It was impossible for them to subject themselves to this examination and then go to the University afterwards. The effect of this system would be to exclude the students of Scotch Universities from the part which they had hitherto taken in the Indian Civil Service. One-tenth of the whole came from the Scotch Universities, and they would all acknowledge the ability with which that Service was conducted. The question was whether they would support and endorse a system the practical working of which would be to throw the Indian Civil Service into an Oxford or Cambridge College, more probably into an Oxford College? He did not consider that the argument for the association of young men before they went out to India carried conviction with it; for how could they secure association? The system might result in a special Oxford College for the purpose of the Indian Service; but he ventured to think it would be better if students had been left to run their chance of competing in an examination in London. He believed that some people entertained the idea that the moral conduct of the students would be better preserved by their being at Oxford rather than in London; but if they were so weak in their morale that they required that protection, so much the worse for the future government of India. He trusted that the scheme would be regarded as purely tentative, and he doubted whether this particular plan of giving a monopoly to a particular College of Oxford would answer.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, the idea of there being any association necessary for the training of young men for the future government of India was a bit of nonsense. The simple question was whether a monopoly should be given to the English Universities. He had gone through a competitive examination, and he thought the examinations ought to be open to all young men who believed they were competent to go through the ordeal, and that they should not be confined to the sons of the great and independent, who had influence which was used for their relatives or friends. Some slight concession had been made by the Government to the Irish Universities; but the appointments were reserved principally for Oxford.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE remarked that all those who had spoken against Lord Salisbury's scheme had spoken on behalf of Scotland and Ireland, and not of England. He believed that English University opinion was by no means unanimously in favour of Lord Salisbury's scheme. That opinion rather was that the attendance of students of one particular class at the University, taking no part in its ordinary work, would be a curse to the University and no great advantage to the students.

MR. LAW observed that if the facts stated by his right hon. Friend (Mr.

Lyon Playfair) were correct, the opinion of those most competent to judge—namely, the Indian officials—had been given decidedly against the proposed change. Lord Salisbury thought it important to have the opinion of these officials for his guidance, and it now appeared that 95 were against the reduction of age and only 15 in its favour. If that were so, why should the opinion of those Indian officials be completely disregarded by the noble Lord? The proposed change would be a most serious interference with the interests of the Scotch and Irish Universities. He hoped the proposal would receive more consideration before anything was done in the matter.

VOTES ON ACCOUNT.

MR. RYLANDS said, that he understood Army Estimates were not to be taken, and that the House was asked to resolve itself into Committee for the purpose simply of voting large sums on account of Civil Service Estimates. He wished, therefore, on his own behalf, and on behalf of several hon. Friends near him, to enter a strong protest against the course which the Government intended to pursue. He had placed on the Notice Paper a Resolution on the subject which the Forms of the House did not allow him to move: it was to this effect—

“That it is not expedient, at so late a period of the Session, to grant any further Votes on Account for Civil Service Estimates.”

In preparing that Resolution he had followed the exact words used by the right hon. Gentleman the present Home Secretary, in a Motion which he brought forward on May 25th, 1871, and which he supported in a speech strongly condemning the Liberal Government for proposing Votes on Account at so late a period of the Session. But they had now arrived at a month later in the Session, and there was all the more reason why the House should resist the proposals of the Government. In 1871, when the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cross) brought forward his Motion, it was received with quite a chorus of approval from the Conservative benches. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) complained of the great abuses which must necessarily arise from deferring the full consideration of the Estimates by passing Votes on Account. The present First Lord of the Admiralty took the same line, and the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), with his usual terseness and clearness of expression, condemned the practice of discussing the Estimates at so late a period that they might be said to be shuffled through the House rather than discussed; and he expressed the suspicion that the Estimates might be purposely delayed from the desire of Ministers to shut the mouths of private Members who wished to bring forward Motions on going into Committee of Supply. Let the House remember the position in which they were placed in this matter. There had already been a large sum granted in Votes on Account at the beginning of the Session, amounting to £3,606,000, and there was, no doubt, a justification for that proceeding in consequence of the operation of the Exchequer and Audit Act, which compelled the surrender of unexpended balances at the close of the financial year. It was therefore necessary, in order to meet the current expenditure, for the Government early in April to ask for Votes on Account in anticipation of Committee of Supply on detailed Estimates. He did not object to that course provided only a moderate sum were asked for; but the case was altogether different at later periods of the Session. The Government now asked them to vote at the end of June the sum of £1,327,910 on account of Civil Service Estimates, which was equal to five or six weeks expenditure, and if it were granted, what would be the consequence? Most probably that the consideration of Civil Service Estimates would be thrown over to August, when it would be utterly impossible to give them any serious attention. Probably they would be hurried through in a small and jaded House, upon a Morning Sitting on a Saturday in the first or second week in August, when the slightest attempt at discussion would be resented as an intolerable nuisance. They would probably be told, as was customary upon these occasions, that it was an “Imperial necessity” to pass this Vote on Account to meet the Engagements of the Government at Quarter Day; but who were to blame for the existing difficulty? Clearly the Government themselves, by the way in which they had managed the business of the House in postponing Supply to this late period of the Session. They might have availed themselves of several Mondays which they had devoted to other Business not of a pressing character. Take, for instance, the Prisons Bill, for which there was no urgent necessity, but which had occupied at least two Mondays which might otherwise have been devoted to making considerable progress with the Estimates. The other day, on a public occasion, the Chancellor of the Exchequer alluded to the large amount of time which had been swallowed up by the Prisons Bill, and to the probable large demands upon the national funds which would result from that piece of legislation. The right hon. Gentleman was no doubt right in his statement; but, without dwelling upon any individual case, it was quite evident that the Government by giving precedence to Committee of Supply might have prevented the House being driven into its present position. The practice of Votes on Account was so objectionable that it would be right to take strong measures to put a stop to them; and he was convinced that if the Vote were refused on the present occasion, although there might be some temporary inconvenience to the Government Departments, there would be a final stop put to the vicious practice in future Sessions.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could see nothing practical in such speeches as that to which the House had just been listening, which took up a good deal of time, and which stood in the way of the very thing which the speakers themselves contended ought to be done. They were all agreed that one of the most important duties of the House of Commons was to canvass the Estimates in Supply, and any Government that attempted to prevent the canvassing of the Estimates would be guilty of great misconduct. But the Government had, as a matter of fact, done all they could to bring in Supply on various occasions since the opening of the Session. Indeed, he would venture to say that in no previous Session had the House been so often invited to go into Committee of Supply. When, however, Supply was put on the Notice Paper as the Business of the evening, the time was occupied in discussing Motions of various kinds—a course to which he offered no objection—until near 12 o'clock, when it was urged that it was too late to proceed with Supply. It was not, therefore, the fault of the Government that they were not able to get into Supply. It was not by any action of the Government that that night had been occupied with other matters than Supply, and on other occasions they had been prevented from going into Supply in consequence of the tiresome debates that had taken place on such unimportant subjects as the Queen's Plates and Secret Service money. On one occasion no less than six-and-a-half hours had, he recollected, been consumed in getting through five Votes. If that was the course to be pursued, the House must make up its mind to sit, not only into August, but into September, and it was very probable as it was that the Session would be an unusually long one. It was absolutely necessary to take Votes on Account, otherwise the money would not be forthcoming with which to pay the current services of the country. Next Monday a fresh quarter would be commenced, and the ordinary quarterly payments would become due; and he wished to know whether the House desired that the Government should tell the Civil servants that they could not pay their salaries because the House refused to vote the money for them? He could assure them that he was not at all anxious to take Votes on Account, because by doing so an opportunity was afforded to hon. Members of raising the same objections to a Vote over and over again. The Government had endeavoured ever since Friday, the 16th March, to bring forward the Civil Service Estimates, but without success. It was not the fault of Government that different subjects had been brought forward for discussion on going into Supply, because they had no power to prevent such subjects being brought forward. The result of the course which had been taken in the present instance by the hon. Member would be, whatever might be his intention, simple obstruction, and it seemed like an attempt, under the guise of trying to get forward, to prevent them from getting forward. Under the present system of surrendering the balances at the end of the year, the Government must ask for Votes on Account, otherwise they could not carry on the business of the country. What remedy did the hon. Member propose for it? Were the Government to abolish the system of surrendering the balances at the end of the year? [Mr. RYLANDS: No!] Did he mean to limit the power of hon. Members to move Amendments on the Motion that the House do resolve itself into a Committee of Supply? [Mr. RYLANDS: No!] Then what did the hon. Member mean? Was the House before it began any legislative measures to pass all the Votes in Supply? If so, he was afraid there would be an outcry against the Government for endeavouring to curtail the sitting of Parliament. The real truth was, that if the House desired that its Business should be properly conducted, it must assist in doing it properly, and hon. Members must not come forward, as the hon. Member for Burnley had done, obstructing, and not facilitating business. The Government had already overdrawn to a certain extent, and if this Vote on Account were not passed the greatest irregularity would result, and the public service must necessarily suffer.

MR. DILLWYN said, it was for the Government to say how they would obtain money. The Government were responsible for the conduct of Business in that House, and it was their duty to facilitate it, instead of which they occupied the Morning Sittings with measures that were of no importance. The present Government had the whole time of the Session at their disposal, and what legislation had they to show for it? He might be called obstructive. But the real question was, whether or not the House was to control the supplies? He thought it could not do so if the Votes were taken at so late a period in the Session and in a lump sum.

MR. GOLDSMID maintained that the statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to Civil Service Estimates in the early part of the Session had materially facilitated the progress of the Estimates. The best way to get through Supply would be to have Morning Sittings, at which it could be taken.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) was not deserving of the censure which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had passed upon him. The right hon. Gentleman had addressed the House at considerable length, and did not appear to be exceedingly anxious to go into Committee of Supply. He (the Marquess of Hartington) did not think that when a Vote on Account was asked for they were wasting time in asking whether the Business of the House had been conducted in the most satisfactory manner. There was a Standing Order that on Mondays no Motions could be brought forward on Supply except in relation to the Estimates, and the Government had not availed themselves of the facilities given by that Order. At a very early period of the Session they had asked for Morning Sittings; but they had used these Sittings for the purpose of advancing Bills which, in the opinion of a considerable number of Members, were of no great importance, and not in taking Supply. On the evenings of the days on which Morning Sittings were held the House was generally counted out, and Members who were thus prevented from bringing forward their Motions naturally took advantage of the first night when Supply was down to bring them before the House. It was the conduct of the Government and not the conduct of the House which had rendered it necessary to make this demand for a Vote on Account which the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted was objectionable.

MR. BUTT thought the charge of obstruction made against the hon. Member for Burnley was perfectly unfounded. He was not obstructing the business of Supply, but obstructing a Vote on Account to which they all objected. They understood that the business of the night was to be the Army Estimates, and not one of these Motions could have been brought forward if the Government had taken the Army Estimates. He thought it was better that legislation should be postponed than such a violation of the Constitution should occur as the House losing control over the Army Estimates. If he withdrew his opposition to the Vote on Account, he should like to know if the Government would name a day on which the Estimates would come before the House, so that they might have an opportunity of discussing them? Take, for instance, the Irish Education Estimates, on which there were important Motions that they desired to have the opportunity of discussing.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. GATHORNE HARDY expressed a hope that the Business of the evening might proceed without heated controversy between the two sides of the House. He would remind the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) that eight Mondays had already been taken in Supply. On two of them the Army Estimates had been set down with the unusual result that only two Votes had been obtained on each occasion, while to-night Supply had not yet been reached. As for the present state of Business, the interests of the private Members seemed to him to be as much concerned as those of the Government. That night there had been 32 Motions on the Paper, and nobody knew beforehand which of them would be taken. Surely some remedy for this state of things was desirable? It was now the intention of the Government to proceed steadily with the Estimates, and he could assure the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) that the House would have a full opportunity for discussing the various items. He hoped that that evening the House would grant the Vote which was so necessary for the carrying on of the public service.

MR. PARNELL wished to remark on, not to say contradict, the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the vast amount of time expended in discussing the Secret Service Vote, and also the Vote for Queen's Plates for Ireland and Scotland. He (Mr. Parnell) was in the House that night, and there were just two hours spent on the Secret Service Vote. Many of the speeches were of 10 or 15 minutes' length, and on his own part he spoke only five minutes. It was a subject of great interest, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer must agree that the time was not ill-spent. As to the Queen's Plates Votes, the Scotch Plates were discussed by Scotch Members almost entirely, and the next Vote was opposed by the noble Lord sitting just behind the Treasury Bench (Lord Randolph Churchill), and his speech much exceeded in length that of any other speech made during the evening by any Member in connection with the Secret Service Vote. Those two Votes did not take much more than an hour, so that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer threw up his hands and called upon the House to bear witness to the time wasted it was quite unnecessary. He hoped the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) would not be deterred from doing his duty by the charge of obstruction. He had heard that charge made by many persons, and by writers in the newspapers, during the present Session, but in no case was that charge substantiated. He regretted the Chancellor of the Exchequer had followed that bad example, and if he had tried to substantiate that charge he would have found himself unable to do so.

Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

MR. BUTT moved the reduction of the Vote by £316,750, the amount included on account of Class 4. The hon. and learned Member said, he did not wish to persevere with his opposition then, if he had the assurance that there would be an opportunity of discussing the Irish Education Estimates. At the same time, he reminded them of a Motion he had brought forward early in the Session, on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed that to defer Estimates to a late period of the Session was, in fact, to deprive Parliament of the proper control over the Estimates. To vote the Estimates and to guard the public purse was the first and highest duty of the House. But so much of their time had been taken up in patching up statutes, that the House had lost all control over the Government expenditure. When he contrasted the great promises of late Sessions with the little work done, he could not help thinking that they ought to have more time to discuss the Estimates.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a further sum, not exceeding £1,011,160, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge for the following Civil Services and Revenue Departments, to the 31st day of March 1878."—(Mr. Butt.)

THE O'CONOR DON said, they might without difficulty grant a Vote on Account if the Government would promise that the Estimates should be brought on when they could be fully discussed. They were entitled to ask the Government to fix a day if they made this grant on account. It was true that there had been 32 Amendments on going into Committee of Supply, but that was because the Government had put down a Vote on Account of the Civil Service Estimates; and therefore every Member was obliged to put his Notice down, as he did not know what might take place. He thought it would be very convenient if the Chancellor of the Exchequer could state what particular Vote would be proposed at particular times.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, while admitting that nothing could be more reasonable than that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick and the hon. Member for Roscommon should like to have a day fixed for the Votes in which they were interested, said, it was obvious that the Government could not promise a particular day for bringing on those Votes. If he had been asked a question of that kind last week, he should have said that the Army Estimates would be taken on Monday, and the Education Estimates on the following Monday. But the discussion before going into Committee on the Army Estimates prevented that course being adopted. What he proposed was, to take Supply every Monday, and next week, not only Monday, but Thursday also. He should like to devote, as well, a Morning Sitting to Supply; but he had promised that Tuesday or Friday morning next should be placed at the disposal of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. R. Smyth) for the Irish Sunday Closing Bill. At the conclusion of the Army Estimates he proposed to proceed with Class 4, including the English and Scotch Education Votes, but did not think there would be time to discuss the Irish Education Vote the same evening. He wished to proceed with Supply as quickly as possible.

MR. GOLDSMID said, he understood that up to the present time only about 17 hours had this Session been devoted to the Civil Service Estimates in Committee of Supply. He wished to know whether the Secretary to the Treasury would promise that in future the House would be furnished with Returns as to the time devoted to the different classes of Supply each Session?

MR. BUTT said, he would be quite satisfied with an assurance that the earliest possible day after the Army Votes would be given for a discussion of the Irish Education Vote and Estimates.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would give this assurance.

CAPTAIN NOLAN hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give a day for the Education Vote for Ireland. The Irish Members had to go away long distances, and it would be a great convenience for them to know the particular day.

THE O'CONNOR DON trusted that an early day would be named for the discussion of the Irish University Education Bill. Should the right hon. Gentleman be in a position to give a day, at some reasonable interval, for its discussion, he would not bring on the Motion of which he had given Notice on going Committee of Supply.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asserted that the Government was responsible for the delay in getting into Committee of Supply to-night. The whole difficulty was due to the fact that the Government was in conflict with the intelligence of the House. The Government had a mechanical majority, but they made a mistake in attempting to force legislation which was not wanted—Judicature Bills and the like. It was simply impossible that the House could continue to be treated in this manner, and for the purpose of dividing the House on the question, he should move the omission of Class I. of the Estimates. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) had written to the Chief Secretary for Ireland on the subject, but had received no satisfactory reply.

MR. BUTT understood the Government were pledged to bring on the Estimates at the earliest opportunity. The question of Irish Education rose out of that, and it would be convenient to the Irish Members to know when an opportunity for discussing the Education Estimates would be afforded.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER could not give any promise as to the Irish Education Vote, though he hoped it might come forward this Session. As to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, it was difficult to pledge the Government to any particular day, because it was impossible to say how long the English Votes might take; but he would make every effort to consult the convenience of the Irish Members, and would give them as long notice as was possible.

MR. BUTT said, he was quite satisfied with the assurance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY hoped that a day would be named for the consideration of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, which would ensure its discussion in a full House.

MR. PARNELL thought this was a good opportunity of asking the Chancellor of the Exchequer, what Bills it was the intention of the Government to proceed with?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the answer to the Question would be out of Order.

MR. PARNELL said, that if Supply had to wait for these Bills, Supply would be obtained about Christmas. He was anxious to get a definite date as to when the Education Bill would come on?

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked, if it was really the intention of the Government to pass the Irish Prisons Bill this Session?—so that Irish Members might be in a position to tell their constituents if they would have to pay their share to the English prison expenses, and support their own prisons as well.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, whether the Prisons Bill passed or not would depend upon the Irish Members. He was anxious in this matter to put the two countries on an equality.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: What, Sir, do I hear? The right hon. Gentleman says in the matter of prisons he wishes Ireland and England to be on an equality. Is that what he says? He says that it is only with regard to the Prisons Bill that the Irish people should be placed on an equality with England. Why did not he say so last Tuesday week, when it was desired that the people of Ireland should be placed on an equality with the people of England with regard to the franchise? It appears to me, Sir, it is only with respect to punishment that we are to be equalized. ["Order!"] What! am I not speaking the truth?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member is out of Order.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought it inconvenient to introduce discussion of these Bills on a Vote in Supply. He assured the House that the Government was anxious to get on with the Business as speedily as possible, and he appealed to hon. Members to support the Government in proceeding with the Business.

MR. DILLWYN commented on the conduct of the Government in running the important Business of the Session to the end of it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER denied that the Government were open to such a remark. If they proposed to go on with Bills, they were told they should push forward Supply. If they endeavoured to go on with Supply, they were told they should push forward the Bills. How the time had been occupied, the House was aware.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked why there was no money asked for on account of county prisons and reformatories, while there was a Vote on Account for the Government prisons? The Chief Secretary had merely eluded the question. He moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Captain Nolan.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH explained that whether the Irish Prisons Bill passed or not, England and Ireland would be on the same footing as regarded the expenses of prisons until April, 1877. The reason why there was no change in the Vote on Account, as alluded to, was because it happened that none of the expenses of which the English counties were to be relieved by the English Prisons Act came within the current year.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that he and those with him were willing to offer no opposition to the Irish Prisons Bill, provided that Irish prisons were placed exactly on the same footing as English prisons, and that the same Amendments were incorporated into the Irish, as had been introduced into the English Bill.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: Upon the same footing! It is a pity that the right hon.

Gentleman did not make this statement a few days ago on the Franchise Bill. It appears that the Irish people are to be put on the same footing, as regards prisons and punishments, but not as regards the franchise. ["Order, order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was out of Order to refer to previous debates.

MR. PARNELL said, he should like to ask whether, in the event of the Irish and Scotch Prison Bills not being passed, the Government would bring in a Bill next year for the purpose of relieving the Irish and Scotch ratepayers of the year's charge thrown on them for the maintenance of the Irish and Scotch prisons, in consequence of the failure to pass these Bills this Session?

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow;

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If instructions have been given to Colonel Wellealey or to other British officers holding similar appointments to report any excesses committed by the Russian Army? In putting the Question the noble Lord said:—Notwithstanding Mr. Bright's silence at Birmingham, and notwithstanding that the Reform Club by its invitation to Midhat Pasha has disassociated itself from the frenzy of last Autumn and repudiated the assertion that the Turk is "unspeakable" and that the Ottoman Parliament is not worthy of respect and confidence, it is possible that there may yet be a few persons who adhere to the wild opinions disseminated last Autumn. I will therefore preface the Question of which I have given Notice with a few observations. After reading the Papers respecting the treatment of the United Greeks in Poland it will hardly be denied that the Russian soldiers are not wholly incapable of committing excesses. Still less, after what has been reported of the massacre by the Russian troops of the sick and wounded in the hospitals of Ardahan, can it be held improbable that the Wallachian peasants will be exposed to great oppression by the Russian soldiers, when German subjects have been the victims of Russian ill-treatment in Bucharest itself. And it must be admitted that the Russian Army is more deserving of censure for acts such as those at Ardahan than the Army of any other nation, when it is remembered that but a few years ago it was Russia which summoned the nations of Europe to a Conference at Brussels for the avowed, and it may now be said hypocritical, purpose of humanizing warfare and prohibiting explosive bullets. It will also be remembered that, thanks to the wariness of the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, this country was not entangled in the snares that were prepared against the Maritime Powers, for the Brussels Conference came to nought, and separated without being able to carry out the design of its promoters, which was to cripple the offensive and defensive capacity of the Maritime Powers by exempting private ships from the effects of war. What, then, is to be thought of the conduct of Russia in sinking four small Turkish merchant brigs by torpedoes? Instead of following the usage not only of civilized nations, but of all nations, and calling on these vessels to surrender, the Russians destroyed them and sent their crews out of the world without notice, by treacherous engines more repugnant to humanity than the explosive bullets used to blow up ammunition waggons. The recent declaration of a leading St. Petersburg paper was therefore very opportune when it stated that Russia is not the mandatory of Europe, and would not accept interference with its conduct of the war; though this declaration is inconsistent with Russia's previous unfounded assumption that she is acting for Europe, and with the sanction of Europe. Apart from motives of humanity, this question has become necessary in consequence of what has recently been said with regard to Sir Arnold Kemball. That officer, in the exercise of his discretion and in accordance with the gallantry that was to be expected of him or of any British officer charged with reporting on military events and with gaining military experience, exposed himself to considerable danger, and his doing so does not require to be excused; indeed, the gist of Colonel Wellesley's complaint, and the indignity put upon him, was that he was kept in the rear; and it was hardly necessary to state, by way of giving a sop to those who cavilled at Sir Arnold Kemball, that he was charged with the duty of reporting any excesses against the civil population. But if Sir Arnold Kemball received instructions on this point, it is evident that they are equally necessary in the case of Colonel Wellesley, and of any British officer accompanying the Russian Army near Ardahan. I will not ask my noble Friend the Secretary of State to follow me through all the matters I have touched upon; but I will ask him if our neutrality will not be infringed if similar instructions are not given to the British officers in both of the opposing armies?

THE EARL OF DERBY: In answer to the Questions of the noble Lord I should say that no special instructions have been given to Colonel Wellesley, or to other British officers holding similar appointments, to report any case of outrage or violence committed by the Russian Army. No special instructions of that kind have been addressed to Colonel Wellesley; but it is well understood that the duty of Military Attachés accompanying foreign armies is to send home reports of any operations of war or any circumstances connected with the campaign or other matters which they may think important or interesting to their Government. I have no doubt that if any act of the kind referred to came under the observation of a British officer he would send home a report of it. With regard to the special case to which the noble Lord has referred—that of Sir Arnold Kemball—it was thought that civil war, attended with outrages, might break out in the provinces to which he was sent, and that Her Majesty's Government might, by timely representations, prevent the recurrence of them. It was with that view that special instructions were given to Sir Arnold Kemball.

GAME LAWS (SCOTLAND) AMENDMENT BILL.—(Nos. 44-97-118.)

THIRD READING.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order.)

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, that in Committee he had proposed an Amendment to the 4th clause, with the view of remedying some complaints which had been made with respect to "compensation for game harboured on the lands of the lessor," and he promised to consider the matter. After having given it that consideration, he had come to the conclusion that the complaint would be remedied by leaving out the words which had reference to game that might be harboured on the lands of the lessor to which the reservation or retention applied. He therefore proposed that those words should be omitted.

Motion agreed to; clause amended accordingly.

THE EARL OF SELKIRK¹ moved to insert a new clause to follow Clause 7—

"Where in any lease made subsequently to the passing of this Act a lessor and lessee have agreed that any claim of damage arising under this Act shall be referred to arbitration, the same shall be referred to arbitration in the manner, and subject to the provisions mentioned in the lease, but if the lease contains no provisions as to the manner of arbitration, or if for any reason such provisions cannot be observed, then the arbitration shall be conducted in the manner hereinafter in this Act mentioned."

As he had already pointed out, if the clause were left as it now stood there would be two sets of arbitrators, one appointed under the Act, and the other named in the lease. The effect of this would be that the former would supersede the latter, who had been chosen by the parties.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERRY said, that when on a former occasion the noble Earl brought forward his Amendment, he used the argument that where there were general clauses of arbitration in the lease it would be more convenient and would cause less confusion if the arbitration under this Bill were confined to those general clauses. But under this new clause, as proposed by the noble Earl, the ground for his previous contention obviously disappeared, because the clause spoke of a particular arbitration in the lease. The arbitration in the Bill was therefore to be set against an unknown arbitration, composed of unknown words. What would they gain by the clause? They would not gain under it the convenience of referring to general arbitration the particular arbitration of matters affecting game. They simply gained the substitution of particular words of the noble Earl's unknown arbitration for the particular kind of arbitration laid down in the Bill; but it stood to reason that no one would wish to change simplicity and uniformity for needless variety; and no one would wish to exchange a known method of arbitration for an unknown method. It might be in the case of a bad landlord that his own factor would be appointed arbitrator; and in that case the clause would have no effect at all. The main object of the Bill was to set at rest the agitation that now existed on the subject in Scotland; but if they allowed persons who were carrying on that agitation the possibility of availing themselves of the noble Earl's Amendment, they would be far from settling the agitation, as it was hoped they would be able to do by the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, there seemed to be some misunderstanding as to the exact position of the question. His noble Friend (the Earl of Rosebery) said that when in any lease there was an arbitration clause there was no reason why any disputes which arose under this Act should not be settled by the arbitrator appointed by the lease. But his noble Friend had forgotten that the Bill did not apply to any existing lease, but only to future leases, and therefore they might put aside all reference to cases where there was at present a machinery for arbitration. With regard to future arbitration, if there was to be any arbitration at all, he was bound to say that there could not be a fairer machinery than that which was provided by the Bill. Each party chose their own arbitrator, who, in case of disputes between themselves, appointed an umpire who would decide between them, and to such an arbitration as that he did not think that any objection could be made. The Bill, as it stood at present, only provided that arbitration should take place after disputes had arisen, and only in case the landlord and tenant agreed to refer it to arbitration, instead of going into Court. He stated on a former occasion, when the noble Earl on the cross benches (the Earl of Selkirk) proposed his Amendment, that it appeared to him that it would be a very reasonable alteration to make in the Bill, and that it would be an improvement if, instead of providing that any disputes that might arise should be settled by arbitration, a provision could be introduced into the Bill by which the landlord and tenant could stipulate once and for all that, in case of any disputes arising between them under the Act, they might be referred to arbitration under the arbitration clause of this Bill; and he was bound to add that he was to some extent responsible for the drawing of the clause, and he put in those words to give effect to the views of the noble Earl. At the same time, it might be said that they went too far and prescribed a mode of arbitration, and also that some of the subjects of arbitration might be different from those described in the Bill. He thought that the real remedy would be some slight amendment to the 6th clause. He proposed to add the words—

"In any lease made subsequent to the Act, such question should be referred to the arbitration provided in the Bill."

That would make the landlord and tenant coming under the operation of the Act say at once whether they chose to have any disputes referred to the arbitration under the Act or not, and he thought that if those words were inserted they would meet the views of the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERRY quite agreed with the Amendment proposed by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack.

THE EARL OF SELKIRK said, that all he wanted was that there should be no doubt as to the power of the landlord and tenant to refer any disputes that might arise under a lease to the arbitrators appointed by the lease, and he understood that when the Bill was passing through the House of Commons there was no objection to such a provision being made; but, to his astonishment, when the Bill came into their Lordships' House, he found it was not inserted. He did not think that the Amendment suggested by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack would meet the case as completely as the clause he proposed.

EARL GRANVILLE preferred the words suggested by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack to the clause now suggested.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON expressed himself of the same opinion. The only objection of the noble Earl was that the Bill set up an unknown system of arbitration in Scotland; but he thought their Lordships would agree to the proposal of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, and reject the clause of the noble Earl.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Then the Lord Chancellor's Amendment put, and agreed to.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

QUESTIONS.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD— ENGINEER INSPECTORS.—QUESTION.

MR. HUTCHINSON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is aware that cases have occurred in which Engineer Inspectors under the said Board have given evidence in a private professional capacity before Select Committees on Private Bills; and, whether he will state to the House any regulations he has made, or intends to make, in order to prevent a continuance of the same?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, a case has recently been brought under my notice in which an Engineer Inspector acted in the manner referred to in the Question, and I have since ascertained that in three or four other instances a similar thing has occurred; but, in those cases, the consent of the Department was previously obtained. In the particular case referred to, the Inspector does not appear to have been aware that he had committed any irregularity; but I have taken precautions to prevent such an occurrence in future, and have given specific directions that the Engineering Inspectors shall not, either with a view of giving evidence or otherwise, advise in their private capacity on any matter within the jurisdiction of the Board or in relation to which they may be required to act officially, in respect to which an inquiry is ordered.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR— ALLEGED RUSSIAN ATROCITIES.

QUESTION.

MR. R. POWER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the Government have received any information as to the atrocities alleged to have been committed by the Russians upon the Mussulman population of the Caucasus; if he is in a position to state whether or not the Russian Army, in addition to pillaging and burning Mussulman villages, and compelling the inhabitants to declare themselves orthodox Christians, under pain of being immediately put to death; if women and girls are being massacred after undergoing the most frightful outrages; that the male inhabitants who are spared are being sent to Siberia; and that these atrocities are being accomplished by the orders and under the eyes of the chiefs of the Russian Army?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the Turkish Ambassador in London has communicated to Her Majesty's Government a telegram from the Porte which states that the atrocities enumerated in this Question have been committed; but Her Majesty's Government have no means of obtaining other information, as they have at the present moment no Military Attaché serving with the Russian Army in Asia and no Consular Agents in the districts occupied by Russian troops.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM—SALARIES.

QUESTION.

MR. W. C. CARTWRIGHT asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any decision has yet been come to in regard to the Regulation of Salaries of Officers in the British Museum consequent on the scheme which, according to his statement on a former occasion, was to have been transmitted by the Treasury to the Trustees of the Museum on June 4th; and, in the event of no definite decision having as yet been arrived at, whether he can make any explanatory statement as to the position in which the matter now rests?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, no decision has as yet been arrived at; I will, however, state exactly the position in which the matter now stands. In February last, the Treasury forwarded to the Trustees the outlines of a scheme based upon the 2nd of the Reports made by the Playfair Committee of Inquiry. In April the Trustees replied, proposing certain modifications of detail, to most of which on the 4th of June the Treasury assented, so far as they were consistent with the principles of the Playfair Report, but suggesting alterations in the relative numbers of some of the classes, whereby the serious increase of expense occasioned by the improved scale of salaries might be compensated. On the 20th instant the Trustees replied, omitting to notice the assurance required for an alteration of numbers in the several classes, but adhering to their former proposal in particulars quite inconsistent with the scheme originally submitted to them, and with the Playfair Report. The Treasury naturally hesitates to add £7,000 per annum to a charge for salaries already exceeding £56,000 per annum, without obtaining economies which they believe, and which it has been partially admitted, might be effected by the consolidation of departments, and some reduction in the numbers of the more highly-paid classes without any sacrifice of efficiency or of personal interests. The scheme of the Trustees contains not only the extra or duty pay of the Playfair scheme, but also a higher commencing salary and a higher maximum salary than is provided in that scheme or than the Treasury believe to be necessary. There is not the slightest objection to produce the Correspondence which has passed.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE CIRCUITS.

QUESTION.

MR. C. W. WYNN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If the Judges do not go Circuit with a Commission of General Gaol Delivery; and, if this be so, whether he is aware that the Lord Chief Baron has declined at the approaching Assizes for Montgomeryshire to try prisoners committed to the Quarter Sessions; although, on the present occasion, the Assizes will precede the Quarter Sessions?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he believed that in the case of all the Circuits, except the Northern and the North-Eastern, there was a commission of general gaol delivery, which would embrace all prisoners, whether committed to the Assizes or to the Quarter Sessions. He was not aware that the Lord Chief Baron had declined to try prisoners committed to the Quarter Sessions.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE
(IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. BUTT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can give an opportunity of discussing the University Education (Ireland) Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he was perfectly aware from the communications which had been made to him, and especially from what he had been told by an important deputation of Irish Members who had done him the honour to call upon him some time ago, that great interest was felt in this Bill by Members for Ireland. Now, he apprehended that there was no possibility of the Bill becoming law this Session; but he understood that the hon. and learned Gentleman and others were desirous of an opportunity of discussing its provisions. He might say, in passing, that the Bill was one which the Government could not accept, and in regard to which they would feel much difficulty; but, at the same time, it might be a measure which it would be proper to discuss. That discussion could be taken either upon the Bill itself, or upon the Irish Education Estimates. As, however, it was probable that as much time would be taken up the one way as the other, he thought it would be more satisfactory that the discussion should be held on the Bill itself. At the same time he must remind the House that, on the previous night, the Government were pressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman himself and many of his Friends, as well as by others, to go on with Supply, and with Supply they must go on, even at the cost of postponing and possibly endangering some of their own Bills. In those circumstances, all he could say to the hon. and learned Gentleman was, that he would be glad if he found himself able by-and-bye, during the month of July, to give an opportunity for the discussion of the University Education (Ireland) Bill. Any promise he could give must, however, be contingent on the progress made with Supply during the next fortnight.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

COUNTY FRANCHISE AND RE-DISTRIBUTION OF SEATS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. TREVELYAN, in rising to move the following Resolutions:—

"1. That, in the opinion of this House, it would be desirable to adopt a uniform Parliamentary Franchise for Borough and County constituencies.

"2. That it would be desirable to so redistribute political power as to obtain a more complete representation of the opinion of the electoral body," said: I trust that no hon. Gentleman will complain that the promoters of these Resolutions, unappalled by frequent defeats, once more ask Parliament to give public assent to propositions the justice of which no one in private even attempts to controvert. As long as a vast grievance, affecting more or less three-fifths of the population of the United Kingdom, remains undenied and unredressed, there will always be found those who will not be deterred by the fear of being thought tiresome and importunate from calling upon this House to make its annual confession that, in dealing with the claims of the county householder, it does not even profess to be guided by those considerations which influence its treatment of all other matters. Let hon. Gentlemen observe the different position which this question holds from any other that comes before the House. When the Irish tenants apply to Parliament for a change in the land laws—when the Temperance Party applies for a change in the licensing laws—when a portion of the Irish people press for a revision of the constitutional relations of Great Britain and Ireland—however little hope they may have of gaining their point, at any rate, they are sure that their case will be discussed on its merits. On such an occasion, Sir, your only difficulty is to select one among the many hon. Gentlemen who start up in every quarter of the House ready to state the arguments against the measure in as convincing language as he can find at his command. The advocates of these measures are out-voted indeed, and out-voted often by a much larger majority than I hope to see against me to-night, but they go away with the feeling that, right or wrong, they have had their answer; they have been met like reasonable beings; and the cause which they have at heart has not been condemned unheard. But that is not the case with the householder of the counties. When he comes before the House, nothing can exceed the unanimity of the discussion. Our galleries are crowded with his friends; our benches are thickly studded with his admirers; speaker vies with speaker in praising his patriotism, his industry, his frugality, his common sense; and then, after a debate which has been nothing but one long and unbroken panegyric of his civic qualities, comes a division, the result of which is to exclude him from all hope and prospect of obtaining his civic privilege. Until our arguments are confuted by something more persuasive than a silent vote of this House, it is idle to expect that he will sit down contented under a deprivation from rights which, if he had been a new Englander instead of an old Englander, he and his ancestors would have already exercised for a couple of centuries. On all other evenings of the Session the county householder stands before you as a helpless being, with whom you may do what you like; he comes here to be taxed and rated and assessed; to be enlisted in the Army for a long term or a short term; to be buried with or without rites; to be educated with or without a Conscience Clause. But on this day of all the year, and on this day alone, he stands at our door, not indeed in the capacity, but with the claims, of a British citizen; and if those claims continue to be asserted till you are weary of hearing them—for be assured that we shall not easily be ashamed of repeating them—

the blame lies not with us, but with those hon. Gentlemen who refuse to give us any other answer than by the very cheap and easy process of walking through one Lobby, instead of through the other. But though hon. Gentlemen, by declining to answer our old arguments, have absolved us from the obligation of presenting new ones, we shall not avail ourselves of our privilege. Nor is there any need for it; for the nature of this question is such that every fresh Session of Parliament brings with it a whole crop of reasons in favour of the reform which we advocate. There is hardly a Notice of Motion placed upon our Books, there is hardly a Bill laid upon our Table, which does not sensibly affect that large portion of our population who, standing outside the pale of political privilege, see matters touching their nearest interests and their highest sentiments discussed without them, and arranged for them, in an Assembly over whose deliberations they have no larger influence than if they were inhabitants of Kamtschatka. And what manner of men are these, that we should not consult them on the questions of the day? Is the Church of England ratepayer in the rural districts so indifferent to religious matters that he is not to be asked whether he has or has not an objection to seeing burials conducted in the churchyards with rites other than his own? Is he so careless of his money that he is not to be asked whether, in order to settle the burial question in accordance with the views of the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge (Mr. Marten), he is prepared to bear his share in the expense of providing the country with a new outfit of cemeteries? Are the Scotch county householders so ignorant and simple that they are to see the guardianship of their poor and the management of their highways re-arranged for them, without their consent, by Bills which the Lord Advocate has introduced to the House—Bills which these unenfranchised Scotchmen read with an eagerness and attention which hon. Members reserve only for the most sensational of the Blue Books—which many of them understand—and I am not paying the Lord Advocate an ill compliment in saying so—every whit as well as the hon. and learned Gentleman himself? Why, it is this very Parliament which placed in the hands of Scotch shepherds and ploughmen the charge of electing the minister who is to be their spiritual guide and adviser. Are we so inconsistent that we are to refuse them a voice in choosing the Member of Parliament who is to look after their mundane and material interests? When we were discussing the Navy Mutiny Bill, would it have been no advantage to us to have been told by the Representatives of those classes from whom our ships are manned, whether the punishment of flogging is considered by the relatives of our seamen as an attractive or deterring feature in our Service? When we come to discuss the most important War Office Report on the localization of our Army, which has this Session been placed in our hands, would it not be to our advantage that we should know what is thought about the effect of the proposed scheme upon our recruiting by the Representatives of the class from which we fill our regiments? If we want to be informed whether local influences and associations will bring more young men into the Army, it is not to farmers and shopkeepers we should go, but to those agricultural labourers who are the fathers and brothers of our rank and file. From the Valuation Bill of the Government to the Threshing Machines Bill of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), there is no measure affecting our rural population with regard to which we should not be the wiser for knowing the wishes and feelings of those for whom we are undertaking to legislate. And while every year adds to the grievances of the unrepresented county householder, by bringing with it a new list of enactments as to which his advice and assent have not been asked, every year likewise adds, and adds largely, to the number of those who suffer from that grievance, and suffer from it under its most invidious form. It is worth the while of hon. Members to notice what class of our people it is that is increasing with a rapidity that produces such remarkable results in each successive census. It is not to the rural districts that the growth of our population is due. Owing to the conditions of modern agriculture, and other circumstances into which it is now unnecessary to enter, our purely rural population, so far from increasing, is steadily diminishing. There were fewer farmers in 1871 than in 1851; there were many fewer shepherds and in-door farm servants. The class of agricultural labourers proper had fallen in 20 years from 908,000 to 764,000. The only persons employed in rural pursuits who have multiplied during the same period are huntsmen, gamekeepers, and rat-catchers. Nor, again, does the increase in the Census proceed mainly from the people within the boundaries of Parliamentary boroughs. Those boundaries are for the most part sufficiently crowded already. Population follows manufacture, and manufacture requires elbow-room. Population accompanies the spread of mining operations, and veins of metal and beds of fuel are for the most part found in other places than beneath the soil of towns which happened to be summoned to send burgesses to the Parliament of Edward the Third or Henry the Sixth. Wherever coal, or lead, or slate, or iron exists in abundance—wherever wool factories spring up along the banks of some convenient stream—there may be seen streets of well-built houses, rows of thriving shops and stores, schools, lecture-rooms, reading-rooms, elegant churches, commodious chapels—everything that constitutes a town, save and except the rate-paying household suffrage. Let any intelligent foreigner go to such a place as Barrow-in-Furness, and let him view those docks and quays which, if they belonged to Germany or Austria, or Italy, would be regarded with pride as a national possession; these smelting works whose produce would provide a first-class European Kingdom with material for its system of railroads and its iron-clad fleet; those other extensive and valuable manufactures which supplement the leading industry of the place; and when he has finished his inspection of the town which is already justly recognized to be among the wonders of England, then let him be told that, of the 7,000 or 8,000 heads of families whose enterprise and energy have made Barrow what it is, six out of every seven are excluded from those rights of citizenship which in the course of the next three months every Frenchman of mature age will be called upon to exercise. Why are the 25,000 inhabitants of Heywood, and the 25,000 inhabitants of Accrington, excluded from the rights which townsmen enjoy elsewhere?

Mr. Trevelyan

What intelligible reason can you give for such exclusion? What reason, I mean, which would be intelligible to the inhabitants of Heywood and Accrington? Take the woollen districts. The chief seat of a very important branch of the woollen industry lies in a group of towns and villages situated upon the Tweed and its tributaries. Some among these communities have been constituted Parliamentary boroughs, while others still remain part of the county; but if you seek for a reason why the inhabitants of Walkerburn and Innerleithen should be deprived of the franchise which is enjoyed by the inhabitants of Hawick, Gala-shiels, and Selkirk, you certainly will not find it in the character of the population. The people of Walkerburn and Innerleithen earn the same wages as my constituents; they read the same newspapers; they are subject to the same local influences. They share the merits of my constituents; and they would share their defects—if my constituents had any defects. Why, in the name of all that is just and reasonable, should they not share their political privileges? Let us come nearer home, and take the immediate neighbourhood of the Metropolis. If any hon. Gentleman has a spare Saturday afternoon about this time of the year, he will find nothing within the compass of an hour's walk so pleasant as Clapham Common. If he takes the shortest route, over Chelsea Suspension Bridge, and by Battersea Park, he will pass through a region with quite a character of its own, and which well repays a visit. What once were Battersea Fields are now covered with thousands of healthy and roomy dwellings, inhabited by working men who have their business in the Metropolis. Part of this district is well and widely known as the Shaftesbury Park Estate, and hon. Members may recollect how, when the Shaftesbury Park Estate was set on foot, the present Prime Minister, who is always ready to do a good-natured thing, went to Battersea to attend what he justly regarded as a most interesting ceremonial. That ceremonial has within the last week been renewed in the same locality under the same distinguished auspices. On both these occasions the inhabitants of the Victoria Buildings and the Shaftesbury Park Estate were told how grateful they ought to be for the blessings that were provided for them. They are congratulated upon the simple excellence of their architecture, on the breadth of their roads, on the frequency of their churches, on the paucity of their public-houses. But on one point silence was kept, in order, I suppose, that nothing might destroy the harmony of the meeting. They were not told that, as a reward for their intelligence in appreciating a comfortable home, and for their thrift in having made themselves able to pay for it, they had forfeited the privilege of giving their vote for a Member of Parliament—a privilege which was still possessed by their less frugal and provident comrades whose circumstances obliged them to continue living in the smoke and crowd of Southwark, of Finsbury, and of Lambeth. It is not in one part of the Kingdom more than another that a large population is being accumulated outside the boundaries of Parliamentary boroughs. Look at the section on Wales in the preliminary Report of the Census of 1871. In Glamorganshire alone, the increase in the population in 10 years nearly reached the figure of 80,000, which in itself would make a respectable population for a Swiss Canton; and one of the four localities which are responsible for this enormous addition is the district of Pontypridd. Now, if on other grounds the people of that district have a claim to the franchise, I do not think that I need, during the current Session at any rate, consume the time of the House by arguing that on the score of personal character they are worthy of their political rights. The circumstances connected with the rescue of the imprisoned colliers in the valley of the Rhondda speak with a force which any words of mine could only serve to extenuate. If, as we have every reason to believe, these men, of whom we have heard so much, in their heroic courage and in their sincere and sterling religious feeling, are but a fair specimen of the miners of South Wales, if I were one of the Members for Glamorganshire, I should be the first to vote for a measure which would endow me with such constituents. I have been at the more pains to lay before the House the case of the mining and manufacturing population which lies outside the boundaries of boroughs, because this question is generally argued as if it concerned no one but the agricultural labourer. If we take England and Wales as a whole, of the new voters whom this measure would enfranchise, it is probable, according to the best calculation that I can make, that not more than one-half will belong to the class of agricultural labourers. Be they many, however, or be they few, I come with great confidence before the House to ask for their enfranchisement, and for that confidence I have special and recent grounds. We have not often the pleasure of being unanimous with regard to a great social and political change; but, in the course of the present Session, one of those happy occasions befell when all the House was of a mind, and that was when the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) proposed to hand over county business to a representative County Board. It is a strong proof of the justice and reason of the principle on which the Resolutions which we are now discussing are founded, that when that principle is presented to hon. Gentlemen under a new form, from a new quarter, severed from those associations of ancient political controversies which have, I cannot but think, a disturbing effect upon their judgment, it at once is seen to be so equitable and so unanswerable that hardly anyone can be found to speak, and no one to vote, against it. Hon. Gentlemen who regard it as a matter of such moment to give to the ratepayer the management of his own local affairs that they actually invent and create a new representative Body for the purpose, cannot much longer refuse him a voice in the management of the affairs of the nation in Parliament. Just see what the consequences of such a refusal will be. The Representatives of the agricultural labourers will then, as now, be excluded from Parliament. But though they have no power of expressing their sentiments here, they will have a vent elsewhere. On the County Boards will sit, in larger or smaller proportion, men who are the representatives of the labourers, who know their wishes, who sympathize with their opinions, and, if you will, with their prejudices. In a country which has the instinct of self-government, you cannot give men representation, and then dictate to them the nature of the subjects which they are to discuss, and the resolutions which they are to pass; and whenever the mass of our rural population have their minds set on any object, whether it comes within the legitimate scope of county business, or whether it does not, you may be very sure that they will turn these County Boards into so many little Parliaments, where they will give expression to that voice which is stifled at Westminster. And if these men insist on urging their grievance in season and out of season, we cannot justly blame them, for that grievance is curiously compounded out of all the elements which render wrong intolerable; for in the case of the unenfranchised householder the practical injury from which he suffers is enhanced by an insult to which he is keenly sensible. He is not only unrepresented; he is misrepresented. The House of Commons, I am well aware, always prefers facts to assertions, so I will take a special case—the case of a county of small extent, but which, on that very account, affords a clearer illustration of my meaning. Selkirkshire contains about 10,500 inhabitants; but most of these are collected within Parliamentary boroughs, and the entire roll of county electors, dead and alive, only reaches the figure of 272. Well, the past electioneering history of Selkirkshire is worth recording, but into that I will not enter. I will take the register as it stands, and will call the attention of the House to a single item. In the year 1870 a bit of land was bought, and was divided into seven little parcels, each surrounded by a wire fence, and each having two owners. All the 14 lairds concurred with ominous unanimity in having one and the same tenant, for which they had very good reason, seeing that upon the land there was only set of farm buildings. Now, let us turn to the register, and see who these 14 gentlemen are. First come two gentlemen who reside at Lochearnhead. Lochearnhead is a pleasant place; but it is not in Selkirkshire, but in Perthshire. Then we have two Writers to the Signet, both resident in Edinburgh. The 14 proprietors are, in exactly equal proportions, Writers to the Signet in Edinburgh, and county gentlemen whose estates are situated in other counties. There you have an official and authoritative description of these people who, joining in a conspiracy to commit an act which is not indeed opposed to the letter, but which is a violation of the spirit, of our

Constitution, have by a single operation possessed themselves of more than 5 per cent of the entire voting power of a county, the inhabitants of which are not so ignorant of public affairs, or so indifferent to the welfare of the nation at large, that they require to have strangers brought in from a distance to speak in their name, and to usurp their undoubted rights. But the people of Selkirkshire have no special cause for complaint. They are in the same plight as the people of every county in the Kingdom. As soon as the polling begins, from one end of the Island to the other, our railway carriages are stuffed with people, with free passes in their pockets, and cut and dried Party notions in their heads, hurrying about from shire to shire to decide the political representation of localities they never visit from one General Election to another. Meanwhile the native and genuine inhabitants of the locality—unable to vote—unable even to influence those who do vote—for these non-resident electors care no more for local wishes and interests than we care for the public opinion of Bohemia—patiently and passively look forward to the declaration of the poll, in order that they may enjoy their sole political privilege—that of knowing the name of the Gentleman whom Providence and the faggot voters had allotted to them as their Representative. It was not so once. Those who characterize the proposal now before the House as a democratic innovation, must have studied history to very little purpose. It is worth our while on this point to appeal to the wisdom of our ancestors. The writs for county elections, as far back as the reigns of Edward I. and his successors, are addressed, not to any special class, but the whole community. The people who are directed to choose Representatives are variously described as “freemen,” “the community of the counties,” “the honest men of the counties,”—a qualification which, as far as my experience goes, would exclude very few of the agricultural labourers. So it was in the good old times; but, after the death of Henry V., power fell into the hands of a lawless clique of nobles, headed by an unscrupulous ecclesiastic. Under the influence of this cabal—as bad a set of Rulers as ever misgoverned a country—a statute was passed which ran thus—

“Whereas the election of knights of the shires to come to the Parliaments of our Lord the King have now of late been made by a great and excessive number of people, of which the most part was people of small substance and of no value, whereof every one of them pretended a voice equivalent to the most worthy knights and esquires dwelling within the said counties, whereby manslaughter, riots, and batteries among gentlemen and other people of the same counties shall very likely arise and be”—

therefore—the statute goes on to say—the right of voting shall be confined to people dwelling and resident in the said counties who have 40s. a-year in land, which, as hon. Gentlemen are aware, is equivalent to at least £40 a-year of our money. Now, I am not going to defend Cardinal Beaufort and his accomplices of passing one of the most unjust laws that disgraces our Statute Book; but, at any rate, they had two excuses which we have not. They were afraid of having riots and batteries, which certainly were frequent enough in the days of open elections, whereas our happy experience tells us that under the Ballot contests are always conducted in peace and quiet; and, in the next place, as the terms of the Preamble show, they confined the choice of Representatives to knights and esquires resident in the county, while we permit the inhabitants of a district in the Lowlands of Scotland to be disfranchised for the benefit of a troop of Edinburgh lawyers and Highland proprietors who have no part or parcel in that district except a fictitious qualification. And if we come to more recent days, the wisest statesmen of our country—such men as the Duke of Richmond, Mr. Flood, Mr. Fox, Lord Shelburne, Lord Chatham, the precursors and progenitors of our modern Reformers—have looked for a remedy to the evils which, from time to time, afflicted the State in the restoration of county elections to the hands which formerly held them. In the year 1790, when the troubles on the Continent were beginning, some of these great men proposed to add to the House of Commons 100 Members, elected by the resident householders in every county. These proposals were combated by Mr. Windham, on the ground that the time was inopportune, and that men should not choose the hurricane season to repair their houses. That is an argument which I suppose will be repeated to-night by hon. Gentlemen who will point to the East of Europe, as Mr. Windham pointed to France; but it is an argument which those who advocate the extension of the franchise need not be afraid of meeting. It is in the time of peril and difficulty—when it is of vital consequence that the public opinion of the country, if not united, should at any rate, be unmistakeable—that we feel more than at other times the inconvenience of a state of things under which two-fifths of the House of Commons only represent two-fifths of the people who ought to be their constituents. That is the answer to the argument, founded on a panegyric of the high qualities of the House of Commons, with which, the day before yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) regaled the ears of the young patriots of Merchant Taylors' School. We are very much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for all the civil things which he said of us. We hope and believe that we deserve them. But that does not alter the fact that, at a crisis when the eyes of Europe are fixed upon us, we cannot pretend that we speak in the name of the entire population of this Kingdom. The jokes of the right hon. Gentleman, good as they were, and his quotations from Milton, do not supply an answer to the people of our rural districts, when they complain that they have no voice in these questions of peace and war; when they ask whether their part in the business is for ever to be confined to sending their sons to be shot, and giving their money to be squandered? No, this of all others is not the time when we, on this side of the House, should shrink from asserting the doctrine on which the creed of our Party is founded—the doctrine that taxation should be accompanied by representation, and that the extension of the franchise to all who are fit to exercise it is a strength, and not a weakness, to the Constitution. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, when they were in a minority, never wearied of asserting their convictions, and fighting their battles, under every form of discouragement, with a consistency that won our respectful admiration. We, too, I confidently believe, have our share of that national courage and constancy which we recognized in them; and I trust that the division to-night, by a unanimous vote of these benches, will show that Liberal Members under every turn of fortune are resolved on being true to Liberal principles. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the first of the Resolutions on the Paper.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Mr. Speaker, my hon. Friend has addressed himself chiefly to the first of his two Resolutions. I shall address myself chiefly to the second. There is a much more general desire to adopt a uniform franchise in counties and boroughs than to re-distribute seats in Parliament; but there are many on this side who think that the two changes should be carried out together. If acting upon the belief that all were agreed as to the expediency and safety of enfranchising the rural householder, a Minister were to propose nakedly to carry that reform, he would at once be met by Party opposition, indirect in character, but, at least, as damaging as could be a direct opposition to the reform upon its merits. That would occur which occurred in 1866; a cry would be raised for a "complete scheme," and the reforming Minister would be overthrown by a union between the Opposition and such among his political Friends as believed in the pressing necessity for a re-distribution. The wise and the honest course for those of us who desire both reforms is then to connect them in our movement from the first. While, however, we are bound to keep before the country the subject of re-distribution, we cannot fairly be asked, as yet, to give to Parliament the details of our plan. We are not all agreed upon those details; but we are at one in thinking the matter of such importance that we should be willing to waive our individual views upon detail, and to accept, when the time has come, that scheme which has the highest chance of passing into law. There are some of us who attach, indeed, so much importance to a re-distribution as to think its pressing moment one of the strongest among the many reasons that favour the equalization of borough and county franchise, for that reform is, of necessity, involved in any such complete re-distribution as we desire. A Return which has lately, upon my Motion, been presented to the House, shows an immense increase in electoral anomalies. Those anomalies are growing at a pace, of which persons, who have not examined this question for themselves, have not the least idea. The pace is not only a rapid, but it is also an accelerating pace. The electors in the small boroughs and in the agricultural counties considered together have, for a long time past, shown no increase, but they are now beginning to show a rapid diminution. In the Return of the present year, we find an enormous growth in counties which include great towns or the suburbs of great towns; we find the numbers in East Surrey swollen; we find an increase in West Kent, in Middlesex, in all the divisions of Lancashire, in the East Riding of Yorkshire, in all the divisions of the West Riding, in the part of Warwickshire which includes Birmingham, and in Glamorganshire; but there has been such a diminution in the great majority of the counties that the total number of county electors for all England and Wales, while it shows hardly any change whatever when considered absolutely, when considered relatively to the increase of the population of the country, shows a marked decline. The electors of all Ireland, counting together the electors in the counties and the boroughs, are stationary in number, and would show a general falling off, were we to deduct the single town of Belfast, in which there has been an immense increase. The increase in the number of Scotch electors is the increase in the single county of Lanark and in the three great boroughs of Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dundee. The increase of the total number of the electors of the United Kingdom is an increase confined to the great borough constituencies and the counties surrounding London, or containing manufacturing towns. The increase in the constituency which I have the honour to represent is one of 1,500 electors every year. The increase at Lambeth has been an increase of 2,000 electors in a single year. The increase at Manchester is 2,000. The increase at Birmingham has been 2,200 in the year. There are seven boroughs returning seven Members to this House which have a total number of electors less than the annual increment at Birmingham. The disparity between the number of electors to a Member in the borough where the elector has the smallest electoral power, which was last year the borough of Hackney, and which is this year the borough of Lambeth, and the small borough in which votes have the greatest weight—I do not say the greatest value, for fear of being misunderstood—is as 1 to 162. Metropolitan electors count only on the average, taking London through, 150th part the political power possessed by certain electors who live in small boroughs. In face of the fact that these anomalies are as great as the figures show, and that, great as they are, they are increasing more and more rapidly every year, I do not see how it is possible to refuse to admit that the subject needs immediate attention at the hands of Parliament. It has often been contended, or, let me say, pretended, that the small boroughs form a kind of representation of the minorities among the county electors. If they are to be defended on that ground many would prefer to see county minorities directly represented in this House. As matters stand, in the case of several counties in the South of England, the small boroughs are so numerous as to give to those counties unduly great political power. Take, for instance, the cases of Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, and Cornwall. Those counties are, if we consider the present number of their electors, sufficiently represented by their present number of county Members. If, however, household suffrage were to be extended to the counties, then many hon. Gentlemen who sit for boroughs in those counties would, perhaps, become the Representatives of the Liberals among the county voters in the first four counties which I named, or of the Conservatives of Cornwall. Under our present system the Members for the smallest boroughs in these counties are neither borough Members proper, nor county Members proper, and cannot speak in this House with that authority which Members of their political standing would possess, if they represented great bodies of electors. In Berkshire, for example, there are four boroughs returning five Members to this House. Reading is a borough of considerable importance. Windsor is somewhat small, and as I gather from the remarks that were made upon it by the Judges who presided over the trial of the last Petitioner, far from pure. Abingdon and Wallingford are so small, that, in spite of the considerable size of Reading, the five borough Members from Berkshire represent only between 8,000 and 9,000 electors. Take Buckinghamshire again. There we also find four boroughs returning five Members to the House. Aylesbury is large, Wycombe is not very small, but Buckingham and Marlow are so tiny, although Marlow is styled "Great," that the five Buckinghamshire borough Members represent only between 7,000 and 8,000 electors. In Wiltshire, the next in order of the counties named, there are no less than nine boroughs returning 11 Members to this House. Of these, Cricklade is a large borough; but most of the others are so small that the 11 Wiltshire borough Members represent only between 13,000 and 14,000 electors. The same number of householders as inhabit these nine Wiltshire boroughs, returning, as they do, 11 Members to this House, if they all lived together in the suburbs of the metropolis, would not be deemed of sufficient consideration, any more than Croydon or Battersea are deemed of sufficient consideration to specially return a single Member to Parliament. As they are lucky enough to live in Wiltshire, they return 11. Wiltshire, with 24,000 electors, is represented by 15 Members, while twice that number of electors in Lambeth are given two. In the county of Cornwall there are seven boroughs specially represented. Cornwall is a case which I would recommend to the attention of hon. Members who sit opposite. Cornwall returns nine borough and four county Members. Of these 13 Members the great majority are Liberal; yet, speaking from this side of the House, we cannot but admit that as long as the present franchise is maintained, electors who live in Cornwall are as greatly over-represented as electors who live in the capital, or in Lancashire or Yorkshire, are greatly under-represented in the Commons. The nine Cornish borough Members represent but 8,000 electors, a number which would be politically insignificant in the metropolis or in the North of England. Dorsetshire is the last county which I named. In Dorsetshire there are six boroughs. In this case again we can show that we raise no Party question. Bridport and Poole return Liberals to this House; Dorsetshire and Wareham return Conservatives; Weymouth, which alone among the Dorsetshire boroughs returns two Members, sends us "one and one."

Sir Charles W. Dilke

Shaftesbury, which one would say at first sight must take a side, and make of this Dorsetshire borough representation either a Liberal, or a Conservative Party question, succeeds in doing nothing of the kind. Shaftesbury, although it returns only one Member, contrives, difficult as the task may seem, to manifest its high impartiality, and to keep the Party balance even. Shaftesbury notoriously depends upon the influence of Motcombe. Now, the influence of Motcombe is in so singular a position, through the political differences of the various members of the Westminster family, that in the last Parliament the Motcombe influence was Whig and returned a Whig; that in the present Parliament the Motcombe interest is Conservative and returns a Conservative; and that it is well known that there is every probability that, at a future time, the Motcombe influence will again be Whig. It has been stated in all the newspapers, and not denied, that it is useless for a Liberal to stand for Shaftesbury at the present moment, and that it would be useless for a Conservative to stand for it at that future time of which I speak. In other words, it is as useless at the present time for a Liberal to stand at Shaftesbury as at Wilton; but it was as useless for a Conservative to stand at Shaftesbury when Motcombe was in Whig hands, as it was useless for a Conservative to stand at Wilton when the Herbert family was Whig. The seven borough Members returned by the six Dorsetshire boroughs represent 6,000 electors. Here are 6,000 Dorsetshire borough electors returning seven borough Members when 60,000 electors at Liverpool, 61,000 electors at Glasgow, 62,000 electors at Birmingham, and 64,000 electors at Manchester return only three Members each. Is there any such extraordinary political spirit, any such marvellously keen political intelligence in the electors of Dorchester or of Wareham that the 600 and odd electors of Dorchester should be given a Member specially to represent them in this House, when exactly one hundred times as many electors at Manchester return but three? We wish it to be understood that those of us who propose these reforms do not expect of them that they would exclude from Parliament those hon. Members, many of them men of great ability, all of them, we hope, useful Members of this House, who represent the small constituencies. We wish only that, which we are persuaded the majority of them wish themselves, that which some of them have had the courage to go down to their boroughs and avow, that they ought to sit here not as the special Representatives of decayed communities, but as the Representatives of large bodies of their fellow-countrymen. There is one other matter in connection with this branch of the subject to which it is difficult not to allude; indeed, I did allude to it just now in the case of Windsor. I speak of the electoral practices—the electoral mal-practices for which some small boroughs are notorious. It is I fear the case, that in many of these small boroughs—it is certain that in some, corrupt practices exist, and that no candidate who is determined not to pay one farthing without a clear account as to the manner in which his money was expended, can possibly hold those seats. There are still constituencies in England in which the first question asked, not, indeed, of candidates themselves, but of those who are charged with conducting their elections, is not a question as to their political opinions, but a question as to the amount of their wealth. Not only is much political demoralization produced by the laxity of public morals upon this point which still prevails in many boroughs, but these facts are well-known abroad, are repeatedly referred to in foreign journals and in foreign Assemblies, and cannot but in some degree diminish the high respect in which abroad the deliberations of this House are held. “Influence,” too, is still so rife that whole pages of our Parliamentary guides are filled with lists of boroughs in which the politics of the people are held to be of no account when compared with the opinions of some great neighbouring family. What is the practical importance of a change in the distribution of political power, the theoretical need for which can be shown by statistics so clear as those to which I have referred. I have tried in previous years, in moving Resolutions couched in the same terms as the second of those which is this day submitted to the House, to prove that not even the more showy reform of an extended franchise is of so much moment. There are some of us who go so far as to believe that a re-distribution of political power will be found to as greatly transcend in importance the mere extension of the franchise as it does in difficulty of treatment. The practical injustice of the present state of things has been often shown in cases in which the interests of the inhabitants of great communities have come into conflict with what may be termed private interests. I have several times given to the House instances in support of this view, of which the defeat of the Birmingham Sewage Bill, after a conflict between a city and two landowners was an admirable example. That Bill was thrown out on a division by a majority formed of hon. Members who represented vastly fewer voters than did the Members who voted in the minority. So far as we could judge the opinions of the voters by the opinions of their Members the present President of the Board of Trade and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth were in a minority of 500,000 voters on that occasion, although they had a majority in the House. Our proposals as to re-distribution have been met by an attempt to frighten the country by the bugbear of a vast disfranchisement. It is not disfranchisement that we propose. If you equalize borough and county franchise at the same time when you re-distribute seats there will be no actual disfranchisement of any individual elector, but only a reduction of the unduly great political importance which has hitherto been given him. No voter would cease to have a vote; he would have his county vote instead of a vote in an over represented borough; that is all. The Conservative Party, from whom the majority of the supporters of the small boroughs are now drawn, are accustomed to declare that it is good Conservative doctrine that political power should be given, not to numbers, but to intelligence and to property. By upholding the special, and unduly great, representation of decaying communities, of a few hundred voters each, they do not, as a rule, whatever may be the case in certain isolated instances, place the representation in the hands of electors who can be fitly said to well represent either the property or the intelligence of England. If we compare the property and intelligence of the largest and those of the smallest towns, we shall not be brought to the belief that in giving 150 times as much proportional power to the latter as they give to the former, Conservatives are taking the best course towards carrying out their object. It may however be pleaded, even on behalf of numbers, which they are fond of contrasting with property and intelligence, that it always is assumed in all political discussion, that a majority in the House of Commons represents, or ought to represent, a majority of the electors of the country. The majority of electors; not a majority of rich voters in particular, but of voters rich or poor. Wealth ought to have obtained, has obtained, its fair influence at the elections by which any House of Commons is, or can be returned. Property, too, is specially represented in the House of Lords; and the modern theory of the House of Commons is, that it represents the people who have each one his life and limb and work or trade and property itself, however small that property may be, within the control of law. To the laws of England, then, the consent of all the English people through their Representatives is, or should be asked. If it is a maxim of the Constitution that all who have to pay the taxes should be consulted upon the taxation which they will have to bear, it is even more clear now than ever at any time before, that all the rural ratepayers at least should be given their small share in government. I have heard that some may vote with us this year who have abstained from voting in the past. I not only hope that that is true, I not only believe that it is true, but I see reasons why men should join us now who have hesitated up to the present time. I speak not of unworthy motives, I allude not to political ambition, but the reasons which I have in view are drawn from the conduct of the Government itself. Only this year they have pledged themselves that they will soon destroy an organization of county government which has existed in England from the Saxon times. For nomination they are going to substitute election. What clearer duty can lie before all Englishmen who can lay a claim to the title Liberal than to insist that the new system of election shall not be such a miserable compromise as that which the Government in a Bill before the House have proposed for Scotland, but shall rest on a wide and a defensible base. What could be clearer policy for the Conservative party, if they would only dare it, than by basing our whole political system, in country and town alike, upon the possession for a certain time of a fixed home, to establish a new foundation for the Constitution which they might hope would live as long as our country itself shall exist.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it would be desirable to adopt a uniform Parliamentary Franchise for Borough and County constituencies,"—(Mr. Trevelyan),

—instead thereof.

MR. SMOLLETT: More than two years ago, an incident occurred in this House to which I desire to call attention for some moments. In the Session of 1875 a Motion was made to issue a Writ for the election of a Member to serve in Parliament for Stroud, in Gloucestershire. A Motion of this nature, being matter of form, is usually passed without observation; but, on this occasion, it was opposed with some vehemence by the hon. Baronet who represents the City of Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). That hon. Gentleman treated the proposal as a mere device to bring into the House of Commons a man of talent and abilities—qualities which he said were very undesirable in any Member, and were most unsuitable for a Gentleman sitting on the Opposition benches. The presence alone of the ex-Member for Kilmarnock—for Mr. Bouverie was the party indicated—would, he declared, destroy the repose, and would put an end to the holy calm, which had spread over the benches on both sides of the House ever since the Conservative Administration had been installed in office. Now, if repose be really needed, if an absence from divided courses were required to cement the discipline of the once powerful, but now disorderly, Liberal Party, surely, some of the foremost men upon the Opposition benches must curse, in their hearts, the electors of the Border Boroughs who had sent to this House as their Representative a Gentleman of acknowledged talent, a statesman who thinks for himself, and who has adopted as a Party cry the question of an unlimited extension of the suffrage. By means of this cry, the hon. Gentleman doubtless hopes to bring that section of the advanced Liberal Party with which he is connected, into office, at some period more or less remote; but he must well know that the discussion of this question is distasteful, at the present time, to many thoughtful men in the Liberal ranks. These Gentlemen dislike the scheme by reason of its own demerits; and they detest it the more, because at this moment the matter is regarded by the masses out-of-doors with apathy, indifference, and neglect.

The hon. Member for the Border Boroughs must be perfectly cognizant of the disunion which prevails in the Opposition camp on almost all important matters of policy, both foreign and domestic. The only subject-matter upon which the Liberal Party is at one, is the Burials Bill. The hon. Gentleman must know that, irrespective of the Members from Ireland who swarm below the Gangway, and who have an organization of their own, repudiating the discipline of the Liberal Whips, there are seated around him Liberals and Liberals. There are upon the Opposition Benches men who style themselves advanced Liberals, who will eagerly support the Resolution now before the House, for they are men who prate about the sacred right of insurrection, men whose political sentiments gravitate towards Republicanism. Again, there is a large body of hon. Gentlemen upon the opposite side who may be called earnest Liberals, men who are always yearning to bring within the pale of the Constitution parties who have not yet acquired the privilege of voting, and these hon. Gentlemen will doubtless support the Resolution. I have little or no sympathy with politicians of this class, and for this reason, that for 60 years of my existence I lived without a vote, and I never felt the want of one. It is true that in recent years I have purchased two small freeholds which now qualify me to be a voter in two counties. I am, in point of fact, one of the proprietors adverted to by the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs, of the Shaws Estate in Peeblesshire; but I have not found myself, since I became a voter, to be either an abler, a wiser, or a better man. Moreover, if the Resolution under debate be adopted, and if the county franchise be really assimilated to the borough franchise, I shall lose these votes; for the borough franchise is an occupation franchise, and my votes are what are called in Scotland faggot votes. I shall not regret the loss of the votes, for they have given me an immense amount of trouble in the past. Then there is a considerable number of hon. Gentlemen, mostly seated above the Gangway, who may be called aristocratic Liberals, men who assume the appellation of Old Whigs, and a very respectable appellation it is. Those men are, to a large extent, the possessors of "Old Acres," and they have in their ranks a considerable amount of brain power. Now, a Party possessed of these qualifications is entitled to have its voice heard in the Councils of the nation. In point of fact, this Party did make its sentiments known to the country in the winter of 1874, and in the spring of 1875. Upon those occasions the Whig Members, to some extent, visited the constituencies which returned them to Parliament, and to their constituents they freely unbosomed themselves. These hon. Gentlemen frankly admitted that the Party had met with an awful mauling at the General Election in February, 1874; but they said that they had anticipated defeat, and had discounted defeat. They insisted that they had been discomfited, not through the moderation of their political opinions, but by the mischievous restlessness of their Leader. Who the Leader was I need not mention. These hon. Gentlemen continued to profess unbounded reliance in the truth of Whig principles. Whig principles were indeed the proud inheritance of the Anglo-Saxon race. Whig statesmen, they declared, never advocated extreme or violent measures of organic change, and proposals for assimilating the franchise in boroughs and counties, and suggestions for the wholesale creation of electoral districts throughout Great Britain, they considered violent and revolutionary measures of change. In the pursuit of Constitutional amendments of the Representation, the Whigs, they said, desired to see the Constitution dealt with upon the principles of homœopathic treatment. In short, it seems to me that some lines written by Mr. Canning, and published in The Anti-Jacobin some 74 years ago, addressed to the followers of Mr. Addington, then known by the sobriquet of "the Doctor," fitly express the cream of Whig policy at the present juncture. The lines were these—

"They no random measures urging,
Make us vain alarms to feel;
With moderate doses gently purging,
Ills that prey on Britain's weal."

Well, Sir, I am opposed, like the Whigs, to the constant application of drastic purgatives to the British Constitution. But the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs is a Liberal of a wholly different kidney, albeit, he is the nephew of his uncle, Lord Macaulay, one of the mildest Whigs of his generation. The hon. Gentleman saw clearly the overthrow that was awaiting his Party, but he saw it from a different platform, as I shall show. The hon. Member went down to Liverpool, if I remember rightly, in the autumn of 1873. The object of his visit was to take part in the opening of a new Reform Club in that great town. After the ceremony was completed there was a dinner and a drink, and at the jollification in the evening the hon. Member was the London star of the night. He made a capital speech, for few can do the post-prandial part of the entertainment better. The hon. Member told his Lancashire friends that they and the cause to which they were so fondly attached would come to grief at the next General Election, unless they were prepared to accept the policy which he then and there tendered to them for adoption. His advice was, shortly, this—he said they must bring out and parade before the public the Reform engine which had been for some time laid up in ordinary. He insisted that they must put it, and keep it, in a thorough and perfect state of repair; that they must have always alive under the boilers a rattling fire; and at Election times, that they must emblazon in letters of gold, upon their banners, blazing measures of organic change. These, said the hon. Member, are the only methods by which the Liberal Party can be brought to act in unity for the future; and the hon. Member was quite right in thinking so. Well, the General Election came off in February, 1874, much sooner than was expected, and with it came the collapse of the Liberal Party. I shall not stop to inquire why the ruin came. One Member of the late Cabinet is reported to have stated publicly, that he and his Colleagues were "lied out of office"—a very coarse expression, but coarse men will force their way into Cabinets in these degenerate times. Here, however, we have to-night the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs, true to his principles, propounding for acceptance to this House a Resolution which will pledge the Legislature in the future to carry out huge schemes of Constitutional change, the discussion of which is, I repeat, gall and wormwood to many of the moderate Whig politicians seated on the Opposite benches. I state this, indeed, upon the supposition that there is some honesty in political life—a belief in which, the longer I live, I am more and more inclined wholly to repudiate.

The abstract Resolution now moved will, if it be adopted, bring about much greater and more momentous changes in British institutions than those wrought by the great Reform Bill of 1832, or by the leap in the dark of 1867. The application of household franchise to counties will add, it is calculated, at least 1,000,000 of fresh votes to the counties of England and Wales alone. The present constituencies do not exceed 700,000 electors. If the freeholders be eliminated, the present electors would not exceed 500,000, and the new electors will be more than double the old constituencies. I cannot see myself how there can be a real assimilation of county and town voting if the freeholders are retained. Now, this is a gigantic measure of Reform, and yet the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs has always spoken of his proposals as involving a very modest measure of political change. In Scotland and in this House he has frequently stated that the proposal is a mere corollary to the Bill of 1867. He has spoken of it as an adaptation to the present time of a measure introduced into Parliament in 1859 by the Cabinet of the late Earl of Derby, and pressed for acceptance on the country by a Conservative Administration. Now, I perfectly remember the Bill of 1859, and the circumstances under which it was launched. The Session of 1859 opened with a Speech from the Throne, produced by a Liberal Cabinet, presided over by Lord Palmerston. In the Royal Speech it was announced that a Bill for the improvement of the Representation of the People in Parliament would be laid before both Houses. No Bill, however, of this character was introduced by the Government, simply because, within a very few weeks, the Cabinet of Lord Palmerston was tripped up. The Administration was placed in a minority through an intrigue or cabal led by Mr. Milner Gibson and by Lord John Russell, two ambitious Whigs, who had been left out in the cold, and who were very desirous of place. When Lord Palmerston's Cabinet resigned, Her Majesty entrusted the formation of a new Ministry to the late Earl of Derby. The Cabinet of that Nobleman conducted the Administration in a makeshift fashion for three months, and by that Cabinet the Reform Bill of 1859 was introduced agreeably with the promise held out in the Queen's Speech. The Bill of Reform in that year was certainly framed on homoeopathic principles. The proposal did, indeed, attempt to assimilate the franchise in boroughs and counties, but without success. The main feature of the Bill was a reduction of the £50 tenancy qualification in counties to a £10 rental qualification. The next proposal was to deal with the freehold franchise. The Bill of 1859 enacted that when the freehold was situate in a borough, the owner should vote for the borough; and that when the freehold was situate in the county, the owner should vote for the county Members. The Bill proposed to take 15 single seats from the smallest boroughs and to confer those seats on large towns and extensive counties. But how was the Bill met? It was opposed, mainly on the ground of its assimilation tendency. Lord John Russell moved an abstract Resolution in obstruction of the Bill. The Resolution stated, firstly—

"That it was unjust and impolitic to interfere in the manner proposed in this Bill with the freehold franchise as hitherto exercised in the counties of England and Wales;" and, secondly, "that no re-adjustment of the franchise would satisfy the House or the country which did not provide for a greater extension of the borough franchise than was contemplated in this Bill."

This Resolution was carried by a considerable majority, and the Bill was not proceeded with. The Resolution had the general support of the Liberal Party, and it was entirely hostile to the principle of assimilation. From that date no Ministry has again proposed to assimilate the franchise in town and country. But, apart from this, any comparison of the Bill of 1859 with the present proposals is farcical. Under any Bill framed in the spirit of this Resolution it will be necessary to erase from the electoral map every borough under 30,000 inhabitants. Great Britain, under a new system like this, must be parcelled out into electoral districts. If the proposal for the re-adjustment of political power does not go to the extent at first of equal electoral districts, an agitation to that end will at once arise; and the demand is one which cannot be resisted. For 10 or 15 years the House of Commons will be pestered with perpetual demands for tinkering and tampering with the Constitution—and all necessary fiscal, social, and legal reforms must cease to be discussed. The result of the whole will possibly be universal suffrage—male and female. Rather than encounter this turmoil I really think that it would be preferable—certainly it would be more business-like—to refer the British Constitution en bloc to the tender mercies of a Select Committee. There are men in this House, I dare say, perfectly ready to perfect a brand new Constitution, stock, lock, and barrel, in the course of three weeks. But this is a practical proposal, and because it is so no attention will be paid to it. I therefore must fall back upon a direct negative of the abstract Resolution proposed to-night by the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs.

To secure, however, the negation of the principle of this Resolution by a large majority, we must rely to some extent for support upon my hon. Friends the Whigs, to whom I have referred, and with whom in principle I am at one. The only distinction between us is, that I am disposed to act up to the force of my opinions, while the Whigs are not. I have long observed that men of advanced principles in the House of Commons are men of energy and of political backbone. The Whigs, as a rule, are weak-kneed; they have no bone in them, only a small amount of soft gristle. These hon. Gentlemen practice largely the virtue of abstention, not from liquor, but from voting. The hon. Member for the Border Boroughs, in 1874, brought in a Bill to assimilate the franchise in counties and boroughs. In May, 1874, he pressed the Bill to a division. The second reading was negatived by a ma-majority of 114 votes. How was this majority obtained? It was more than twice in excess of the normal Conservative majority in the House. Why, many moderate Whigs absented themselves from the division. In scanning the division list it will be found that not more than six Liberal Members voted in the majority. When the division was called for I was present, and with my faithful eyes I saw several hon. Gentlemen rise from the front Opposition bench and walk leisurely out of the House. From the majesty of their gait, and from the apparent earnestness of their demeanour, it might have been supposed that they were engaged in the performance of a solemn public duty. They went out only to liquor up in the Lobby, and to evade voting upon a most important Constitutional principle. Yet these same men, six months afterwards, visited their constituents, and with much tall talk spoke of purity of motive and fixity of principle being the only attributes that made public life endurable in England. Political ambition, tempered with honesty, they boldly declared was the greatest virtue under Heaven. In my judgment men who enter Parliament to follow politics as a profession, to obtain office, or possibly to get a handle to their names, embark in a pursuit which, if their career be a long one, must compel them to eat a great deal of political dirt. Certainly, to avoid voting on a grave subject, for fear that the loud expression of opinion might militate against their accession to office under an advanced Liberal Cabinet, at some future period, is not an heroic nor a patriotic action. A continued adherence to this practice tends to degrade political life, to bring principles and professions into obloquy and contempt.

Upon the present occasion, therefore, I trust that there will be no mistake. I do hope that a considerable portion of the moderate Liberal Party will dissociate themselves this night from their democratic allies, and will vote against the adoption of this abstract Resolution. Measures conceived in the spirit of this Resolution were most certainly condemned by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford City (Sir William Harcourt), in the address which he made to his constituents in the Corn Exchange, on the 21st December, 1874. He then protested against being precipitated into schemes of violent and extreme change, at the dictation of extreme politicians of the advanced Liberal section. The hon. and learned ex-Attorney General the Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), at a meeting of his constituents, stoutly announced, in 1874, that he would be no party to a policy which would necessitate the erasure from the electoral map of the town he so ably represents. Let him show himself then, on this occasion, bold enough to vote against the Resolution of the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs. The hon. and learned Member for Poole (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) certainly, at a political dinner in 1875, in the Isle of Wight, expressed himself in a way that would imply his active hostility to a proposal like the present. He thanked Heaven at that county gathering that it was not he, nor his trusted political Leaders, who had brought the residuum or scum of the roughs into the borough franchise. Surely, that hon. Member will not now insist upon the introduction of a more ignorant mass into county constituencies. Lastly, I must mention one more right hon. Gentleman, a staunch Whig, who most ably declared two years ago his rooted hostility to the project of the assimilation of the county to the borough franchise. The party to whom I allude is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Massey), who now occupies the seat long held by the late Viscount Palmerston. That right hon. Gentleman, in addressing his constituents in December, 1874

"protested against dealing with great questions of Constitutional change in the revolutionary spirit that actuated the late Government. He protested against the introduction of a new Reform Bill in the present Parliament which would pave the way in a short time to the demand for universal suffrage male and female."

The right hon. Gentleman said that, in his judgment,

"the introduction of household franchise into counties would not improve, it would deteriorate county representation, by bringing in one class of voters who might from their numbers swamp all the rest."

The right hon. Gentleman declared

"his entire satisfaction with the existing franchise, which had brought into being a constituency which expressed the genuine feelings of the people of Great Britain, and which opened an avenue to the House of Commons for every description of talent, information, and public usefulness."

I beg to express my entire concurrence in the sentiments expressed at Tiverton on this occasion. I therefore trust that I shall vote to-night with this Statesman in the same Lobby. Truth compels me to say that on searching the Division Lists I have failed to discover the right hon. Gentleman's name in them. When the proposals of the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs have been tested in this House the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Tiverton has always, heretofore, been conspicuous by his absence.

In conclusion, Sir, I shall strenuously oppose the change in our Parliamentary system shadowed forth in the abstract Motion now under discussion, because I distrust the honesty of intention of those who are its most ardent advocates out-of-doors, on the platform, and in the public Press. These men make no secret of the fact, that proposals of the nature indicated must only be the precursors of future revolutionary change. The men in the country who advocate a fresh Reform Bill are the members of "The National Electoral Union." That Association, not long ago, thought itself of sufficient importance to send a remonstrance to the Liberal Leaders, transmitted through the agency of the Liberal Party Whip, the right hon. Gentleman who represents in this House the county of Clackmannan (Mr. Adam). This remonstrance courteously informed the Leaders that no union could prevail in the Liberal Party of the future unless it was based on these principles—1st, uniformity of franchise in boroughs and counties; 2nd, equality of representation secured by equal electoral districts; 3rd, the remonstrants demanded compulsory registration; 4th, a real, not a sham, lodger franchise; 5th, short Parliaments—meaning, I presume, annual, or oftener, if need be, Parliaments; 6th, candidates should be relieved from payment of expenses; and 7th, that election expenses should be thrown entirely on that good natured but over-burdened jackass, the ratepayer. These are the demands of the Unionists. A Bill equalizing the franchise in town and country, unless accompanied by such an honest re-distribution of seats as should practically place the election of Members in the hands of numbers unencumbered by property they regard as worthless. In the Press, the chief advocates of the agricultural labourer are equally outspoken. I shall take but one specimen of the London Press, and I select the newspaper which for some years has strenuously supported the claims of Hodge to the suffrage. I allude to The Examiner. The London Examiner was a newspaper which came into notoriety some 60 years ago, under the auspices of the brothers John and Leigh Hunt. Afterwards it was conspicuous for literary ability under the management of Messrs. Foster and Fonblanc. Latterly it has passed, by purchase, into the hands of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor), and it is now, I understand, the property of that hon. Gentleman. On passing into the hands of its present owner, the editor, with much propriety, in a leading article set forth the principles which the journal would in future advocate—and these were principles of an advanced Liberal type. The editor, with great naïveté, observed that "the time had not arrived when a successful agitation could be organized in Great Britain against the principle of Monarchy. Before that could be achieved much yet remained to be accomplished."

Under these circumstances, the editor said that the efforts of all real Liberals should be concentrated upon a resolute determination to strengthen democratic power, by lowering the franchise, and thereby increasing the Radical element in the Commons House of Parliament; this done, the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church would follow, with other great measures of Reform, and then no doubt the consummation so devoutly to be wished for—namely, an attack upon Monarchy—might possibly be attempted with success. Now, this is plain speaking; and because it is so, I shall take my stand against these daring innovations. I, for one, am prepared to resist changes proposed because they will aid in converting the Monarchy of Great Britain into a Republic of the future. My hope and trust and prayers are, that ere the Queen's Crown goes down, some Radical crowns shall be broke; and, therefore, I shall oppose the measures shadowed forth in the Resolution under discussion, whether they be proposed by an independent Gentleman seated on the back Opposition benches, or whether they may be pressed upon our acceptance hereafter by a Minister of State, standing at the Table, Mr. Speaker, upon your right hand, and advocating changes on the ground that they will conduce to the happiness of the people, and will give increased stability to the Crown and to the dignity of the Sovereign.

MR. STANSFELD said, that if Her Majesty's Government and the Conservative Party were desirous of dealing seriously with a serious question, he could not congratulate them on the fact that the first Representative of Conservative opinion who had risen to express their views had been the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett), who had just resumed his seat. He ventured to say of the speech of the hon. Member, that its strength, if it had any, consisted rather in the recklessness and the coarseness, than in the accuracy and the relevancy of its statements and remarks. The hon. Member made reference to various speeches of hon. Members sitting on the Opposition benches, but not made within the walls of the House, or recorded as part of their debates. He (Mr. Stansfeld) did not know whether the hon. Member had observed the usual courtesy of giving those hon. Gentlemen Notice of his intention to make those references; but he, for one, had so little confidence in his (Mr. Smollett's) accuracy, that if he had given them the fair Notice to which they were entitled, he looked forward to many refutations and denials of his statements before the night was out. Instead of discussing the Resolutions before the House, the hon. Member had given them a recital of the programme of a body called "The National Electoral Union." Now, they had nothing to do in that debate with the programme or platform of any Body, whether influential, or utterly without support in the country. They had simply to consider the prudence and the justice of the propositions contained in the Resolutions moved by his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Boroughs (Mr. Trevelyan). The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Smollett) had largely indulged in the imputation of motives, and alleged that it was not conviction which had led his hon. Friend to bring this subject forward, but the want of some policy and cry which might succeed in uniting the severed ranks of the Liberal Party. The hon. Member, speaking not only of the Liberals, but of political life in England in general, said that for himself, he had little or no belief in the existence of anything like political morality. No suggestion could be more untrue, and he (Mr. Stansfeld) could only wish the Party opposite joy of an advocate with such a faith, and who opened the debate on their side with such arguments. The difficulty which he felt in approaching the subject was of a different kind from that entertained by the hon. Member. That which was unreal to his mind was not the faith of the Liberal Party in household suffrage, but that he saw nothing like any serious opposition to it. Here was a great measure which, if carried into effect, would extend the suffrage within the reach of no less than 1,000,000 of their fellow-subjects. They were all generally agreed that these persons were not unfit for the exercise of the franchise, and that it would be safe to confer it upon them. They were also agreed that the measure of enfranchisement could not be much longer deferred, and under those circumstances it required much more serious and powerful arguments than any he had yet heard to justify the refusal to entertain the question. He was one who believed in the principle of household, or home suffrage. He was in favour of it when he entered that House 18 years ago, and there had been no period from that time to the present when he should not have been happy to vote for household suffrage being given not only to the inhabitants of the boroughs, but to those of the counties as well. Two statements of the hon. Member (Mr. Smollett) were somewhat more relevant than the rest, but he disputed their accuracy. He said that these proposals were brought forward in the midst of public apathy, indifference, and neglect. That would have been a legitimate argument, if it were founded on fact, for Parliament ought not to enact a large measure of reform for which there was no demand. But was the hon. Member right in saying there was no claim or demand by the agricultural labourers for the extension of the franchise to them. What evidence did they require to show that the alleged apathy did not exist, and that the claim which was denied had been advanced? For some years past a Conference had assembled in London of a most remarkable and significant character. On the 16th of May last there was a Conference of delegates from the country. The delegates numbered 2,500, and little less than 1,200 were themselves agricultural labourers. The fact that these men came up to London at their own expense, or that of their friends, and that they demanded the extension of household suffrage to the counties, was in his (Mr. Stansfeld's) opinion, sufficient evidence of a claim which ought to attract the respectful attention of the House and of the Government. The answer to the hon. Member's argument about Lord John Russell's Resolutions against the Conservative Reform Bill of 1859 was, that a good deal had happened since then. Ten years ago the Conservative Party was in power, and passed a measure giving household suffrage to the towns. His hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) now asked why should not the same privilege be extended to the country at large? How far was it in the power of the Government to object? Of the 1,000,000 of persons whom he proposed to enfranchise, one-half were urban in their character, and it would be impossible for the Conservative Party to formulate any objection to them which would not apply with equal force to the enfranchisement which they themselves enacted for the towns. Somewhat less than 500,000 of the persons it was now proposed to enfranchise were agricultural labourers. These men had hitherto been the Pariahs of political society, and their interests had been overlooked, because of their non-enfranchisement; but it would not do now for the Conservative Party to object to enfranchise a class of men whom they especially affected to trust. Originally, his hon. Friend introduced a Bill which, of course, dealt only with household suffrage in the counties, for no private Member could deal with the re-distribution of seats; but it was objected by the Government that such re-distribution must accompany the extension of the franchise; and, therefore, now his hon. Friend accepted that argument, and by bringing forward these two Resolutions, he placed on record his recognition of the fact that a Bill for the extension of the suffrage must also deal in some way with the subject of the re-distribution of seats. Last year when he brought the question forward, the Prime Minister objected to the second Resolution, on the ground that the principle of the re-distribution was not laid down, and, therefore, that the matter had not been brought forward in a practical form before the House. Such arguments, however, as to matters of form were, in his opinion, entirely inapplicable to the Resolutions of his hon. Friend. It was not true that a Resolution of this nature should contain a scheme of re-distribution; because, it would be calculated to hamper, rather than to assist, the Government in dealing with the subject. Coming to the objections in point of substance, he would refer first to the view referred to by the hon. Member who had last spoken, of the advantage of variety and of the objections to uniformity in the suffrage. That view had its due weight in its day, but its day had passed, and there was not any considerable fraction of any Party by whom it would now be upheld. It had been slain by him who had been fondest of using it—the Prime Minister of the present day. He had slain it by the Bill of 1867. He remembered the great satisfaction expressed by the Conservative Party, when they had discovered the principle of household suffrage. Having once got on that firm ground, he asked, how could they in justice refuse to the people in the counties the privilege which they had conferred on the inhabitants of the boroughs? Those who looked on our Representative system as a tool-making machine, and the House of Commons as an instrument, or tool constructed to do a certain work, were logical in their objection to pulling that machine to pieces, as a child did his toy, in order to put it together again. But he disputed the premiss altogether. Our Representative system could not be looked upon as a tool-making machine, nor could the House of Commons be regarded as a mere tool or instrument. Such a notion would be inconsistent with the leading principles and most honourable traditions which had guided the Liberal Party. They had never put their faith in the machinery of Government. They, at all events, believed in life—in the life of the people. They said that an extension of the suffrage, under favourable conditions, would give a more widely diffused, a healthier, and a more vigorous political life to the country; that it would lead a larger number of persons to take an interest in public affairs; and that it would give the House of Commons a more constant and reliable sympathy with the opinions and wants of the people, so that both the Government and the Legislature would rest upon a wider and firmer basis. They believed in no kind of paternal Government, whether despotic, oligarchic, or founded on class representation. What they believed in was the self-government of a free people, as free, as intelligent, and as capable as the English people; and they were convinced that without incurring any danger, but with the greatest advantage to the country at large, they might accede to the proposal of his hon. Friend, and consent to admit 1,000,000 more of their fellow-subjects—as fit as those already within the pale—to the advantages and rights of the political franchise. He admitted freely that the safety of the State was our highest law, and if it could be shown that this extension of the franchise could not be made consistently with that safety, he would also admit the relevancy and force of the argument; but he did not believe that there was a single Member of the House who would say that this was a question of safety, and that they could not venture to extend the suffrage to those people. If, then, the proposal was at once safe and just, he ventured to say it was also serious and urgent. The claim of 1,000,000 men to the suffrage was a claim which ought not, under the circumstances, to be treated with levity or indifference; but when made by the people themselves, as in this case, it should be seriously met and discussed. It was no light matter to treat with levity, a claim the justice of which was generally admitted, and which before long must be conceded. To bring forward common-place objections as to the form of the Resolutions, however, was to treat the question, if not with levity, at any rate, with indifference. For himself—and he thought he might say for the great bulk of those who sat on the Liberal side—they were not disposed much longer to be a tacitly consenting Party to the present state of things, and he ventured to think that the House of Commons, so large a proportion of which owed its return to household suffrage in the boroughs, would best consult its dignity and even its future usefulness and influence by consenting to Resolutions recording its desire to put an end to the exclusion of 1,000,000 of men from rights to which they were in justice entitled.

MR. GOLDNEY denied the accuracy of the last statement of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Stansfeld)—namely, that they were excluding persons from the franchise who had asserted a right to its possession. He admitted that the question was a serious one, but denied that it was urgent. It was a subject which should be dealt with in the most careful and deliberate manner, and he considered that they should have more evidence than had been laid before them that evening before they could agree to the Resolutions which had been presented to the House. Statistical information showed that out of a total male population of 10,500,000, excluding women and children, in England and Wales, there were nearly 2,500,000 electors upon the register at the present time, or almost a fourth of the whole number. With regard to what the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs (Mr. Trevelyan) said about County Boards, he might remark that every county householders had vested in him a right to vote for local government purposes; but this was a very different thing from what was proposed by the Resolution. From the time of the passing of the Great Charter down to the present day, the Parliamentary representation of counties had been guided by the rights of property; whereas, in boroughs, the representation was guided by the rights of occupancy. This difference between the county and borough franchise had been upheld by every Minister of the Crown who had introduced a measure dealing with the representation of the people in Parliament. The proposal now under discussion would add one-third to the existing number of voters, and as the proportion of representation in England and Wales was three-fifths of the borough and two-fifths of the county franchise, any change made in its direction would also involve the necessity for a re-distribution of seats. In this great metropolis there was a population of no less than 4,000,000 out of 10,500,000 who represented borough constituencies. Therefore, a system of equal electoral districts

according to numbers would give to the metropolis a representation of nearly 100 Members. This would produce a centralization that would be most detrimental to the Constitution, as, of course, those Representatives would have the whole government of the Kingdom in their hands. The opinions expressed by the right hon. Member for Halifax pointed to universal suffrage, and the change now proposed in the county franchise must lead to a greater enlargement than was at present contemplated. Although he was anxious to see the representation as perfect as possible—as the present system gave a vote to one in four—he thought there was nothing to wish for, unless universal suffrage was adopted. Considering that only two General Elections had been held since the last Reform Act, he thought matters ought to be left as they were for some time longer. Foreigners thought so highly of the stability of our Constitution that they entrusted large sums of money to our care, and the consequence was that we had become the bankers of the world. It was the secure Conservatism of England that drew to us so much of the commercial and financial business of the world, and a great part of our prosperity was due to the confidence put in us by foreign nations. This was so completely the case that to tamper with our Constitution, or to alter it unnecessarily, would be an injury to our trade. He would not, then, wish the House to underrate the effect of the change proposed, which was really a very serious one. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax had mentioned a deputation to which importance had been attached; but it was notorious that that demonstration was not wholly spontaneous. Nor could he concur with the view that the question was one on which many politicians might be united; those who took that position could not have looked behind the first Resolution at the second, which would commit the House to the principle of electoral districts, and which was fraught with many of the causes of jealousy which had prevailed at the time of the last Reform Bill. That Bill, in his belief, had worked very well, but great caution was necessary, as it would be impossible to undo what had once been done. The Motion before the House actually went further than any that had been hitherto introduced. It would utterly destroy the principles upon which the existing franchise was based, and, in attempting uniformity, would sacrifice many of the best privileges of the House. He could not perceive, at any rate, that there was any urgency in the matter, especially at a time when the business of the country was almost in a state of stagnation. He believed, by considering a Motion of this kind, they were doing more harm than good, as they were occupying time which might be very much better spent. He hoped that the subject would be allowed to rest, and that the necessary practical measures which provided for the material wants of the country would be pressed forward. He should vote against the Resolution.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE disputed the right of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett) to be the exponent of Whig principles, the confession of which, together with an historical retrospect, had formed the main part of his speech. They knew that the historian Smollett was the successor of a Tory Hume and the precursor of a still more Tory Adolphus. It appeared to him that the hon. Member was anxious to assist in that operation which had once been described as stealing the clothes of the Whigs while they were bathing. But if the hon. Member wished to be a Whig, his simpler plan would be to sit on the other side of the House. The hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) had taken a different line; and while the upshot of the one speech was, that the last Reform Bill was so terrible that they ought on no account to extend the franchise, the gist of the other was, that the settlement then effected was too charming to be altered. He (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) differed from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Chippenham in his conclusion, while agreeing with him in his premisses. He believed that the extension made in the franchise by the last Reform Act was an excellent thing, and they ought to be encouraged by what had been done for householders in the large towns to extend it to the rural districts. He represented in that House one of the smallest boroughs in England, and it was to some extent for that reason that he asked for the indulgence of the House while he made a few observations upon that occasion. It was a common thing for hon. Members to say that they represented large constituencies, and on that ground to claim the ear of the House. It seemed to him that those who, like himself, represented small constituencies had a much better claim to a hearing in a case like the present, because, while those who represented large constituencies might hope to represent them still, under any possible scheme of reform, the Members for small boroughs were perpetually threatened with political extinction. Above their heads the sword of Damocles was perpetually suspended. As a criminal convicted of a capital offence was asked by the presiding Judge, whether he had anything to say why sentence of death should not be passed upon him, on similar grounds, if on no other, did he ask to be heard. Orator Hunt in 1831 demanded in loud tones in that House why the borough of Calne was not extinguished. Orator Hunt was dead, and the borough of Calne still survived. Mr. Cobden had said that Calne was a dirty village in Wiltshire; but, although that right hon. Gentleman had been gathered to his rest some years ago, the borough of Calne existed still. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) once said that the borough of Calne was so horrid a place that there was scarcely any atrocity of which he could not conceive it capable. He only hoped that no misadventure would ever occur to his right hon. Friend in consequence of the irreverent way in which he spoke of that borough. If he were inclined to doubt of the Providence which watched over Calne, he should be encouraged by the hope that the bacon trade, which although at present small, would, as it was at that time doing, increase so as to make Calne what it had been once called, "the Chicago of England," and that it would enable him, when this question of Reform assumed a practical shape, to claim not only that Calne should retain its present Member, but that it should have a second. The hon. Member for Chippenham objected to the proposal of his hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) on the ground that if it were adopted, we should have to abolish freeholders and have uniformity of franchise. But it by no means followed from the Resolution that they would have uniformity of franchise, or that they were going to abolish the freehold, copyhold, and other ancient franchises. For his own part, 40s. freeholders, leaseholders, and copyholders were all swept off the register, he would cordially rejoice, not only because those franchises were the means of gross political frauds, but because they were the occasion of the terrible expenses which now attended county elections. He had been told not long ago by a gentleman of almost unrivalled electioneering experience, that if there was to be a reform more than another which was to be carried by the unanimous vote of all Parties, it was to have a single uniform franchise in the counties, whatever that franchise might be, so that party spirit might not be put to the trouble, expense, and annoyance of the present system of registration, with which everybody was disgusted. If he had chosen four years ago, he could have sent every clergyman in North Wiltshire to the roll merely on account of a technical mistake. The arguments which had been adduced by the hon. Member for Chippenham had no doubt been dug out of former Reform debates. Although in 1867 he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) was not a Member of the House, he had the privilege of a seat in the Gallery, and he then heard the same arguments from the eloquent late Lord Lytton in reply to Mr. Mill. He could not understand why if they had an equal franchise they must necessarily have equal electoral districts. The objection of his hon. Friend was large and broad. In a country like this, where you had towns of every size, it would be perfectly possible to map it out into equal electoral districts, whether in the sense of acreage or population. Though he did not know that anyone had ever proposed such a thing, it was said that if they had equal electoral districts, London would have a very large number of Members, and that they would meet in secret always in London, and overawe the House; but there were no fears of that happening. They all knew that at present a large number of hon. Members had residences in London as well as in the country, but they did not attend more regularly in that House than others. He (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) was an ardent supporter of the propositions of his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Boroughs; and he belie-

that if they were agreed to, many improvements would take place in the rural districts. Many things would be done which had been neglected, simply because hon. Members were not bound to the agricultural labourers as they were to the tenant farmers, and obliged to look after their interests. It had been said that the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832 was like breaking up the fountains of the great deep, as after that period reform was carried into every Department, and the most astounding changes took place. Then take the Reform Act of 1869. It enabled the Government in the last Parliament to deal with large questions, because they knew that they had the great body of electors at their back; and yet the argument of the hon. Member for Chippenham seemed to be that if they wanted to have the interests of the agricultural labourers attended to, the best thing to do would be not to give them votes. But he could not understand that argument at all. He must say he thought the very reverse was the fact. So long as they did not enfranchise the agricultural householder, proper attention would not be paid to his concerns. Wherever they had extended the suffrage it had always been attended with great benefit to the class enfranchised. But he believed the advantage in this instance would go far beyond Parliamentary enfranchisement. He believed that when the agricultural labourers obtained a footing in the representation, they would exhibit a greater interest in educational matters than they did at the present time, and that many of those local institutions which were the result of voluntary effort would be extended to the rural districts, and afford the people opportunities of mental improvement which they did not at present possess. Having said thus much in answer to the hon. Member for Chippenham, he must do him the justice to say, living as he did in his immediate neighbourhood, that no one had more disinterestedly devoted himself to the improvement of the labouring classes than he had done; he only wished he would extend his advocacy of their interests to the floor of that House. Now, he believed hon. Members feared less the extension of the franchise, than they did the re-distribution of seats, and that was the grand argument used against the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Boroughs. In the county to which he belonged they held in great reverence the name and fame of the late Earl of Radnor. In the year 1826 he divided the House of Lords in a minority of 1 in favour of the total abolition of tests, and he afterwards had a pitched battle with Bishop Philpotts. He had the privilege of seeing him a few years before he died, when he still retained, at an extraordinary old age, all the fire and vigour of youth. An hon. Gentleman who was in the habit of reading the newspapers to him, said to him on the morning after the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks had introduced household suffrage, he expected he would have shown astonishment and alarm; but said the Earl of Radnor, "I am not only prepared for household suffrage, but for universal suffrage too." He (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) believed that universal suffrage was only a question of time—it was a suffrage which the people of all countries in Europe, excepting Russia, had now. When they had sufficiently extended education, he saw nothing in principle against the extension of the same rights to the inhabitants of the country which were now enjoyed by the inhabitants of the towns. Those who represented small boroughs should be guided by the example and animated by the faith of the late Earl of Radnor. At the time of the Reform Bill of 1830 he was patron of many of those boroughs to which the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had referred, having the name of "Great" attached because they were so remarkably small. A question arose as to the disfranchisement of Great Downton, of which the Earl of Radnor was the patron, and the two Gentlemen who then sat for that borough asked whether he attached any condition to their occupying the seats. "Only one condition," replied the noble Earl, "and that is that you shall vote for the disfranchisement of Great Downton." He, therefore, hoped that the Members of small boroughs, uninfluenced by sordid or personal considerations, would be ready to give way to the judgment of those whom they followed, if it was found necessary for the good of the country—not of Party, as the hon. Member for Cambridge imputed to them—that the Members for small boroughs should disappear from the House, so that those large and flourishing communities which were growing up elsewhere should be enfranchised, or that Members should be given to the swarming populations that lay outside the boroughs they represented. He hoped they would act in the same spirit in which the Earl of Radnor did in his day. The hon. Member for Cambridge had reproached the Whig Party, but he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) could look back with much pleasure to that great statesman, Mr. Fox, whose influence was so much felt in that House. The speech, almost prophetic in its instinct, which he made in 1792 in that House was still fresh in every line, and if Mr. Fox should appear there at that moment that speech would not appear either old, stale, or superannuated. He appealed to the Report of a Parliamentary Committee in favour of household suffrage being the proper basis upon which to place English institutions; but, at the same time, he claimed that a certain variety in representation was of the essence of the English Constitution, or, to use his own words, that "the representation in this House should be of a compound character." Substantially the same language, though slightly different in form, had been employed by almost every great writer on our institutions, whether he was a native or a foreigner. Mr. Fox was the forerunner of Sir James Mackintosh, Lord Russell, and many other eminent men in regard to that doctrine; and Montesquieu and M. Guizot also insisted on a compound character being of the essence of representative government as distinct from aristocratic government on the one side and democratic government on the other. He believed there was nothing in the speeches of the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs and the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea which was incompatible with that principle of having a certain variety in their representation. Indeed, he believed it was possible to agree to them, and yet to preserve that compound character and to avoid that abyss which threatened, in the proposition, to have equal electoral districts. He would say a few words as to the practical shape which reform ought to take; because they might be fairly asked to show their plan. The House did not wish to take a leap in the dark, though they had high authority on the other side for doing that. Considering what the Conservative Government avowedly did in 1868 to benefit their Party, it did not become the hon. Member for Cambridge to accuse those on that (the Opposition) side of now being actuated by Party motives in taking up the question. Despite of what had been said by the hon. Member, he held that this subject — the subject of Parliamentary Reform — belonged to the Liberal Party as its inheritance. They had a pedigree of upwards of 100 years to confirm their claim; whereas the claim of the Conservative Party was based upon a pedigree which was only 10 years old. It was taken up by Lord Chatham, it was the political creed of Mr. Pitt so long as he was a Whig, but he abandoned it when he became a Tory. The most important lesson, however, to be derived from the history of the movement was that Parliament had invariably refused to tinker the Constitution; it had always asked that those who proposed a scheme of Reform should produce a broad and comprehensive plan, showing that they appreciated the subject in all its bearings and details. It passed the Bill of 1832 because it was a great measure, and it then went in for "the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill." It refused to pass a small Bill in 1852; it rejected the measure of 1859 and of the following years, whether proposed by Government or by private Members. The Bill of 1866, introduced by the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), under Lord Russell's Administration, was deemed a small and tinkering measure; but the Bill of 1867 was passed, because it was a large and comprehensive measure, based on a definite principle. The House would refuse to tamper with anything so great and venerable as the British Constitution on any other condition; and therefore because he thought the views of the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs and the hon. Member for Chelsea were large, broad, and comprehensive views, so in proportion, he believed, they had a fair chance of receiving the ultimate approval of the House. Having given much consideration to the matter, he thought that if they once began to touch the question of re-distribution they could not interfere with fewer than 150 seats. He did not himself shrink from that, nor did he believe his two hon. Friends (Mr. Trevelyan and

Sir Charles Dilke) would shrink from it. If they disfranchised his borough (Calne) and others of the same size, they would have to go further and deal with boroughs of not only 5,000 but 10,000, or even more inhabitants. Every town of less than 20,000 inhabitants would have to be content with one Representative. Why, for example, should Barnstaple, with its 11,000 inhabitants, have the right of returning two Members, if Calne was to be deprived of the right of returning one? Notwithstanding this sweeping change, there was not one single town in England which was known as a great stirring centre of independent thought and industry which would be deprived of the right of sending Members to Parliament. Reading, with its 30,000, and Oxford with its 40,000 inhabitants, would not be disfranchised, although Salisbury and Barnstaple, each of which returned two Members, would. If, therefore, the question of re-distribution was taken up it must be on such broad and comprehensive principles as would enable them to have 150 seats at their disposal. Then came the crucial question, what were they to do with the 150 seats when they had got them? By far the best plan to adopt, he thought, would be to give one Member to all large towns that were not represented at all, and which had as large a population as those towns which were partially disfranchised, and to which they would still leave one Member. He believed that the remaining seats would be best distributed by retaining, on the whole, the existing electoral divisions of the country—not mapping out the country into districts returning one Member each, as some reformers had suggested; but giving a large enfranchisement to the householders in the counties, and then adopting either a minority vote or the cumulative vote. They would in that manner obtain what they desired, and, securing that every interest should be represented, and making that House a true mirror and reflex of the nation. He had heard it said that minority representation was a new-fangled scheme, sprung, like Minerva from the head of Jupiter, out of the brains of one or two speculative philosophers living in towns or at Universities. His reply to that was very plain and simple—minority representation had now stood the test of 10 years' experience among the largest towns and counties in England, and he could not see that the objections to it at all outweighed its advantages. At every School Board Election we had an application of the principle of minority representation—we had cumulative voting; and, therefore, whatever objection there might be to minority representation, it was absurd to say the thing had never been tried. It had been tried not only in this country, but elsewhere. People said—"You may have the very best system of minority representation at a General Election; but how will it work at a by-election?" He did not acknowledge the right of those who were opposed to minority representation to urge that objection, because, after all, what did it come to? Simply that at a by-election the condition of things would work in favour of the majority. And that, on the whole, was a recommendation. Then it was said—"You put a special disability on a minority district." That was an illustration of what was called begging the question. Those who were opposed to minority representation no doubt thought it imposed a special disability; but there were hon. Members in the House—the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), and, he believed, the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella)—who maintained that the system was a good one, and that those towns which enjoyed the principles of minority representation were enjoying a special benefit. In Birmingham, in 1868, the minority vote was, no doubt, defeated by a clever arrangement of those gentlemen who ruled the town of Birmingham. But was there no wire-pulling under the present system? Were there no such persons as election agents? It was not in the power of any wire-puller either at Birmingham, or elsewhere, to beat a real minority, if that minority existed. The reason why the minority vote at Birmingham was beaten was, that the minority there was not sufficiently large to elect a Member on the minority principle. He believed that if the most cunning wire-pulling scheme ever devised were applied at a Birmingham election when there was a real Conservative minority, there never would be an instance of keeping that minority out. But in a large country district where there were various interests, and where you could not in any conceivable circumstances discipline year Party as the Liberal Party were disciplined at Birmingham, he believed it would be absurd to attempt to neutralize the principle of minority voting by the application of any wire-pulling scheme.

Notice taken—that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that at the moment when the hon. Member interrupted him, he was about to conclude by thanking the House for the attention with which it had listened to him. He believed that if a large and comprehensive scheme of reform based upon the principle that every householder should be enfranchised were proposed from the Front bench below him, the statesman who proposed it would be numbered with the benefactors of his country, and the nation to which he proffered that scheme would accept it with gratitude from his hands as giving to the country the vigour and energy of democratic institutions without that turbulence and instability which had so often destroyed them.

VISCOUNT EMLYN said, he would admit there were some anomalies in the present electoral system; but the subject under discussion was so large that it was both desirable and necessary that the House should have something more definite in the way of a scheme laid before it than was contained in the Resolutions of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Trevelyan) before it was called upon to arrive at a decision with regard to it. In order to meet the objection that his first Resolution would involve such a large re-distribution of seats as to practically abolish separate representation for the smaller boroughs in England, the hon. Member had brought forward his second Resolution; but something more distinct than that was required before the House could bind itself to a principle the extent and operation of which it was impossible to foresee. They ought to know the actual length to which the hon. Member proposed to go, and they must be careful that in their attempt to abolish one anomaly they did not create a greater one. If the county and borough franchises were assimilated, the additional number of votes created would practically increase the inequality in the value of votes that at present existed. He was unable to see how they could carry out the reform advocated by the hon. Member except by forming equal electoral districts. But if they embarked on that enterprise, could they keep those districts equal? They would be ever varying, and provision should be made for their periodical and frequent revision. Much had been said as to boroughs the population of which had grown and, though it properly belonged to the borough, extended beyond its boundaries. In those cases he believed the population would by degrees be absorbed in the boroughs for every purpose. They had been told that in refusing to pass the Resolution they would be casting a slur upon the rural population. That he did not admit. They should remember that although in the neighbourhood of towns the rural labourer was as well instructed as the town artizan, yet, in other districts, the case was very different. For his part, he was perfectly satisfied that the real aim and object in view was practically to gain a stepping-stone first to equal electoral districts, and next to universal or manhood suffrage; and to that principle he should offer a most decided opposition. The hon. Member for the Border Boroughs (Mr. Trevelyan) had stated that there were subjects as to which, as he said, the rural population felt deeply, but had no means of making their opinions known, and he instanced the Burials question. But if the rural population felt really aggrieved on that subject, could it be believed that so very little would be heard of it, or that they could not find means of making themselves heard? That was an argument which might be adopted or dropped as it suited the convenience of hon. Members opposite; but it was one which he thought would have very little weight with the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) addressed a large meeting in London not long since on the subject of these Resolutions, and he had no doubt that many hon. Members read the right hon. Gentleman's eloquent speech. He had read it; but when he endeavoured to find the reasons put forward by the right hon. Gentleman for supporting the Resolutions, he confessed he could not do so satisfactorily. The right hon. Gentleman said that there were 280 county Members in that House who, he said, were a constant and irremovable obstacle against any change in respect to the question. Did the right hon. Gentleman include in the 280 the noble Lord the Member for the West Riding (Lord Frederick Cavendish) and other county Members who sat on the other side of the House? If so, they must have been surprised at the description he gave of them. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to deal with the question of land, and told his audience of agricultural labourers that four-fifths of the land was held by 12,000 persons; whereupon the newspaper report stated there were cries of "Shame." What was or could be the object of those remarks? What had they to do with the county franchise? He thought the right hon. Gentleman had, so to say, rather let the cat out of the bag. There was no particular reason that he saw for drawing attention to the subject, unless it was intended to hold out a hope to the agricultural labourers that if they had the franchise that state of things of which he had spoken would be altered. He wished to enter his protest against such language. It could not but raise hopes in the minds of the labouring classes which could not, and ought not, to be fulfilled. It was dangerous; he could not conceive it to be necessary or at all appropriate to the subject on which the right hon. Gentleman was speaking. Well, another meeting was held a short time afterwards at a place called the Frying Pan, in Somersetshire. The object of the meeting was to support these Resolutions, and although there was no right hon. Gentleman present, letters were read from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax, and the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs, expressing sympathy with the objects of the meeting. The Resolutions were approved, but the meeting did not stop there. They passed a further resolution—and this was a few days after the right hon. Gentleman made the speech to which he had referred—stating that population was increasing beyond the extent which the limited area of the United Kingdom could feed, save by a greatly increased cultivation of the soil—that the area of cultivable land should be extended and parks limited; that game should be confined to closes and parks, and the Game Laws abolished; that the unpaid magistrates should be removed; that all poor pasture be broken up, and securities taken for the highest cultivation of the land, thus finding remuneration for labour as well as cheap food for the people. Well, if those proposals were to be included in the hon. Gentleman's Bill, it would certainly be a very comprehensive one. But this occurred two or three days after the right hon. Gentleman's speech, and showed that he, having given some sign of dealing with the land, had caused many dangerous thoughts to stir in the minds of those who agitated upon this question. They had been told in that House by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Stansfeld) that this was not a Party question, and ought not to be dealt with in a Party spirit. He asked the House whether the spirit shown by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham was one which should be evinced on a question of this kind? Was it necessary to put dangerous thoughts into the heads of the agricultural labourers, and to set class against class, and stir up Party feeling on such a subject? For his part, he thought it ought to be treated in a much calmer spirit. He could wish that some definite and tangible scheme had been laid before them. They had heard of universal and manhood suffrage, and the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had spoken of the representation of numbers as opposed to the representation of property. Why, then, did not the hon. Baronet include those subjects in a Resolution of his own? They had now, however, to deal with that of the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs, and he trusted it would be rejected by a large majority.

MR. MACDONALD said, he should have contented himself with giving a silent vote but for the speech delivered by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett). He repudiated, especially as far as the agricultural labourers, the ironworkers, and mining population of the country were concerned, the assertion of the hon. Member, that this Resolution would introduce a "worse lot" into the county constituencies than were now entitled to vote for the boroughs. They were a peace-loving and law-abiding class, and such a

this Resolution would give them no franchise at all; it was holding out a fallacy; and to give them the county franchise Government must legislate in a manner which would be entirely antagonistic to the principles of the Act of 1868. As the Resolution was framed the effect would be to make a violent change in the Constitution of the country for the purpose of effecting an alteration that would benefit a very small part of the agricultural population. It would also necessitate a very considerable change in the constituencies of the country. It would swamp many boroughs, and render necessary a corresponding alteration by carrying out an extensive redistribution of seats, and there existed many reasons why such a step should not now be taken. He believed that the extension of the franchise, as regarded the rural constituencies, would be favourable to the Conservative Party, for the agricultural population were not only Conservative by habit, but they were brought into intimate relations with the landowners and with their employers, for whom they had great respect, and to whom they were generally much attached. But he took a larger than a mere Party view of the question, and what he asked himself was, whether the passing of the Resolution would tend to strengthen the institutions of the country; and, as he could not answer that question in the affirmative, he had no hesitation in voting against it.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN observed that with one notable exception all the speakers who had addressed the House had spoken in a serious, sober spirit, recognizing the importance that belonged to this question. That exception was the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett), and it was not the first time that the House had seen reason to question the taste with which that hon. Gentleman addressed it. He divided his speech into two portions: he gave them a dissertation on history and a criticism on his opponents. With regard to his criticism on his opponents, his argument had been sufficiently disposed of by the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice); and with regard to his dissertation on history, it was certainly not very interesting and it was altogether unnecessary. In fact, it reminded him (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) of a passage he had lately read that Hume had written in his history but the stupid finish which he gave when he heard that House, as a "mauling" - "liquored up" - "coarse men" - into a Cabinet mind that no and manner follow the which was not only excuse Cambridge was some accident enable him Cabinet, qua own definition was not so should be extended but whether for extending the old stock as that the time was in station, was favourable, country was had lived in country and it had and better trying the not afraid ground that might expect had been those who wanted so not frightened were told solution was universal suit that that liberty and believed that station was taxes and had prim the appropriate control The brother they rest that Cor then can necessary secure the Stat ally in political matters, to receive the franchise. But what was the answer to that? Educate them—not by the slow process of sending them to school, but by giving them the franchise. What educated people so well in matters of that kind as telling them that they had great and important duties to discharge, and that they had a right to take part in the Government of the country. His own experience had shown him that this was an important means of political education. In 1865, before household suffrage was adopted, the non-electors in towns took an interest in Parliamentary contests, but their questions to candidates were vague and often not pertinent, and there was little difficulty in giving unsatisfactory and illusory answers, which were readily accepted; but since the franchise had been given to this class of men they had met together and discussed political topics, and read newspapers, pamphlets, and political works; so that when a candidate went down among them, questions were put to him which he found more difficult in disposing of, and to which he (Mr. Serjeant Spinks) would not advise the candidate to attempt giving a vague or illusory answer. He thought, therefore, that these were people to whom the franchise might very fairly be extended. Even if these voters would turn against Conservative principles, justice ought nevertheless to be done. That might happen in the counties which happened in the boroughs after the Reform Bill in 1868, when the new voters turned against the dominant power, which at that time was Liberal; but, in time, the impulse would expend itself, and though the agricultural labourers might at first go against masters and landlords, they were not Radical; they were more or less Conservative; they were brought face to face, from day to day and hour to hour, with Nature, which in all her operations was strictly Conservative. The second Resolution was the necessary consequence of the first; it would be necessary to make some re-distribution of political power. There were 187 county and University Members and 302 borough Members; and there were 850,000 voters in the counties and 1,500,000 in the boroughs; so at present boroughs and counties were fairly represented; but if 1,000,000 were added to the county voters, there would be a disparity which could be corrected only by re-distribution. But how that was to be effected was a matter for future consideration. The Resolution stated what would be fair and just, and therefore he would give it his support. He would only say that he could not go into the Lobby against his Party, probably accompanied by no other Conservative Member, without some feeling of pain and regret. But he consoled himself with the reflection that in doing so he was simply acting as a pioneer in the matter, and that he should be followed by his Party in due course. The noble Earl at the head of the Conservative Party would not stop short in his career of usefulness; having given household franchise to the urban districts, he would before long confer it on the rural; and, having consolidated our Empire in the East, he would, by this reform, found a still nobler empire at home where, all governed but still all governing, the humblest and poorest would vie with the rich and the mighty in amending the laws and institutions, and consolidating the power and resources of this great country.

Mr. GREGORY said, it was impossible to deny that the two Resolutions involved a Reform Bill; and as it was only 10 years since we passed one, it was premature to incur the disturbance that would be produced by passing another. To a large extent the workers in mines and in factories were enfranchised by the extension of the boundaries of boroughs which accompanied the last Reform Bill and the creation of new ones. It was implied that the Parliamentary franchise in boroughs and counties was to be on the same footing, and was to depend on residential qualification; and, if that were so, it did not follow that agricultural labourers, for whose benefit the proposal was made, would be enfranchised, because many of them were employed from week to week, and occupied cottages, the rent of which constituted part of their wages, being exempted from the payment of rates and other obligations usually incident to occupation. This arrangement grew out of the ordinary relations of farmer and labourer, and was adapted to their mutual convenience. So far, then, as a large part of the agricultural population which lived in cottages was concerned, this Resolution would give them no franchise at all; it was holding out a fallacy; and to give them the county franchise Government must legislate in a manner which would be entirely antagonistic to the principles of the Act of 1868. As the Resolution was framed the effect would be to make a violent change in the Constitution of the country for the purpose of effecting an alteration that would benefit a very small part of the agricultural population. It would also necessitate a very considerable change in the constituencies of the country. It would swamp many boroughs, and render necessary a corresponding alteration by carrying out an extensive re-distribution of seats, and there existed many reasons why such a step should not now be taken. He believed that the extension of the franchise, as regarded the rural constituencies, would be favourable to the Conservative Party, for the agricultural population were not only Conservative by habit, but they were brought into intimate relations with the landowners and with their employers, for whom they had great respect, and to whom they were generally much attached. But he took a larger than a mere Party view of the question, and what he asked himself was, whether the passing of the Resolution would tend to strengthen the institutions of the country; and, as he could not answer that question in the affirmative, he had no hesitation in voting against it.

Mr. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN observed that with one notable exception all the speakers who had addressed the House had spoken in a serious, sober spirit, recognizing the importance that belonged to this question. That exception was the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett), and it was not the first time that the House had seen reason to question the taste with which that hon. Gentleman addressed it. He divided his speech into two portions: he gave them a dissertation on history and a criticism on his opponents. With regard to his criticism on his opponents, his argument had been sufficiently disposed of by the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice); and with regard to his dissertation on history, it was certainly not very interesting and it was altogether unnecessary. In fact, it reminded him (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) of a passage he had lately read, wherein it was said that Hume had written a very good history but that Smollett had made a stupid finish of it. He confessed when he heard such language used of that House, as that a Party had a "mauling" — that hon. Gentleman "liquored up in the Lobby," and "coarse men sometimes got by accident into a Cabinet," the thought crossed his mind that no deterioration of such a kind and manner of speaking was likely to follow the extension of the franchise which was now demanded; and that was the only excuse for the hon. Member for Cambridge was his probable hope that some accident might occur which would enable him to enter the Conservative Cabinet, qualified under the terms of his own definition. The question to be decided was not so much whether the franchise should be extended some time or not, but whether this was the proper time for extending it. They had heard the old stock arguments against it — as that the people did not want it, that the time was inopportune, there was no preparation, wait till the time was more favourable, and the Constitution of the country would be destroyed. But he had lived to see the Constitution of the country destroyed half-a-dozen times, and it had always risen each time stronger and better for its destruction. In voting the vote he should give he was not afraid to take somewhat of a ground than had yet been taken, and might expose him to the imputation of having been already thrown out — those who advocated this measure wanted something beyond. He was not frightened by phrases; and when he was told that the adoption of the Resolution would lead to manhood or universal suffrage, he was prepared to say that that was the very foundation of liberty and of a free country. He believed that the theory of a free Constitution was this — that every man who paid taxes and discharged his duty as a citizen had prima facie a right to a share in the appointment of those who were to control the government of the country. The broader the foundation on which they rested the Constitution the stronger that Constitution would become. Then came the question of limitations necessary to preserve good order and secure good government. It was for the State to say what limitations should be imposed. But what was the State? an aggregation of individuals; and as the laws which were made for the benefit of all should be such as the common sense of all would lead them to respect, so anything which was done by way of limitation and diminution of individual rights for the general benefit should be done upon principles of common sense, reason, and justice. Now, limitations as to age, as to fixed residence, as to paupers and criminals, and as to persons who held particular offices which rendered it undesirable that they should vote, were quite in accordance with common sense. Then, again, there was the limitation as to sex, upon which much difference of opinion existed, but to which the majority of mankind still adhered. But when the State imposed a limitation resting upon locality and the accident of residence alone, it was one which he maintained could not be defended by common sense or by any principle of justice. The persons for whom the franchise was now asked were denied it on the miserable ground that they lived on one side and the enfranchised on the other side of what had been well called an "imaginary line." Was not that an inequality and an anomaly which ought to be removed, and could it be wondered at that those who suffered from it should bitterly feel their exclusion? It was said, as an argument against the present proposal, that there was no agitation. He never knew how to deal with arguments of this kind. Was agitation wanted or was it not? If there had been agitation it would probably have been said that class was being set against class. He did not think there had ever been a demand made for the franchise in a more proper and at the same time more determined spirit than the present demand. If there had been no rioting and no attacks upon property, that did not prove that the demand was less earnest than it would have been if such things had occurred. It only showed that the temper and education of the people had improved, and it was an additional argument in favour of giving the franchise. This was a question affecting more than the agricultural labourers, but no doubt they formed a considerable proportion of those who made the demand. For his part, he could not understand the extraordinary dread of agricultural labourers which some hon. Gentlemen seemed to feel. He had lived amongst them in the country all his life, and had a great regard for them. Indeed, he did not know any class to whom he would more willingly confide the franchise than to them. He would not cast a stigma on the country landlords and clergy by supposing that the education of the agricultural labourers had been so much neglected that they were not as fit to receive the franchise as any other class. He had attended their recent demonstration, and could testify to their apparent sincerity on that occasion; and he thought it a little hard that when these men came to London at their own expense—thereby proving their earnestness—and made a perfectly peaceful demonstration, they should be sneered at as taking part in a foolish and galvanized agitation. His noble Friend (Viscount Emlyn) had blamed his right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) for some observations which he had made at that demonstration with regard to the limited number of the possessors of land, and had accused him of setting class against class. Now, he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had heard those observations, and could not agree that such was their tendency. As he understood the matter, his right hon. Friend, addressing a large meeting of persons who were seeking the franchise, many of whom were agricultural labourers, pointed out to them, among other things, that there were in the future questions likely to arise relating to the land of this country, and that unless their demand was conceded, they who lived on and by the land would have no voice or influence whatever in the determination of those questions. That seemed to him (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) a perfectly legitimate argument; and, speaking as a landowner himself, he would tell his noble Friend and other landowners in and out of that House, that they were much mistaken if they thought they could prevent these land questions from coming under the consideration of Parliament. They were questions of the future which must and would be considered. It was not the man who exposed the abuses so much as the man who strove to maintain them who really set class against class; and true wisdom would dictate our looking ahead and examining all these questions fully and dispassionately, rather than attempting to put them aside and blaming those who called attention to them. One objection to the Resolutions was that there ought to be a definite scheme proposed with reference particularly to a re-distribution of seats. He admitted that a re-distribution of seats must come, but the two questions depended on different principles. In the one case there was a great denial of justice to many individuals; in the other there was an injustice as between locality and locality. The question of enfranchisement was the more urgent, and could be dealt with separately. When the time for re-distribution came, his noble Friend (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) would defend Calne, and he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) would defend the interests of the larger borough which he represented. But when he was told that he ought to oppose these Resolutions, because some day or other his borough might be affected, he replied that he would not do his constituents such discredit as to believe that from any fear of possible future injury they would wish him to refuse anything the demand for which was founded upon principles of truth and justice. Looking at the question as a whole, he was of opinion that those places ought to have the most wide representation which contributed most to the taxation of the country and its general prosperity; and when hon. Members raised the bugbear of the undue preponderance of Members which the Metropolis would have under an altered system of representation, he said that all these questions would have to be fully and fairly considered at the proper time. In the case of the Metropolis the fact that its Members, from their proximity to the House, were able to attend to their Parliamentary duties more easily than other Members, and that a great many Representatives of other constituencies resided in the Metropolis for a certain period of the year, and were therefore, in reality, as much interested in London as its own actual Representatives, ought to be taken into consideration. The time, no doubt, would come when there must be a re-distribution of seats; but, when it did come all that any individual Member could do would be to make out the best case in his power for his own constituency, while he was not frightened by any personal or local reasons from doing what he thought best for the general interests. Some said that the change now proposed was a small one, and others appeared to regard it as one of great magnitude. Now, if it were only a small change, it could not do a great deal of harm; and if a large one, it was clear that it was so because a great number of persons were now unenfranchised. You could not have it both ways—either the injustice was so small that its removal would hurt no one, or so large as to require immediate attention. He did not think it at all impossible, he might add, that what had been said by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oldham (Mr. Serjeant Spinks) might turn out to be correct, and that the noble Lord at the head of the Government might be the man to introduce such a measure as that now advocated on the Opposition benches; but come from what quarter it might, if the measure was a good one it should have his support. He owned that he should be glad to see his own Party borne into office upon this or any other popular movement; but so strongly did he feel the justice of the demand now made, that he would rejoice to see Lord Beaconsfield recognize it as the logical conclusion of the household suffrage in boroughs which he had introduced. It was said that the respect which was entertained by foreign nations for our institutions was due to their stability, and so it might be to some extent, although he believed that it was rather due to their appreciation of our national character; but that stability, it should not be forgotten, was due to the elasticity of our Constitution and the wisdom of those who in past times had guided the destinies of the country, and who had known how from time to time to make concessions to popular rights. Before he sat down he wished briefly to allude, as it had already been referred to, to the speech which had been made a day or two ago by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) at a dinner given by the Mercers' Company. In that speech his right hon. Friend said that before we pulled the Constitution to pieces, we should carefully consider whether we should be able to make a good job of it, and that unless some great danger or difficulty occurred it might be better to rub along in our present position. [Admiral Sir WILLIAM EDMONSTONE: Hear, hear!] He heard the hon. and gallant Admiral cheer; but what, he should like to ask him, would he think of a commander of a ship who, having had his attention directed to certain defects in his ship, would wait until a storm arose to put his vessel in order? There would, he thought, be little wisdom in such a course. The fact was that the demand now made was one which—whether it was granted in 5, 10, or 15 years—must sooner or later be granted; and why not, he would ask, accede to it while it was gracious and generous to do so, instead of waiting until it was wrung from you by popular agitation. For his own part, it was because he believed the demand was just, and that granting it would tend to strengthen the institutions of the country by adding to the constituencies a class in every way entitled to exercise the franchise, he would give the Resolution his cordial support.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he had, while listening to the debate, felt much sympathy for the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs (Mr. Trevelyan). That hon. Gentleman had been moderate in his remarks, and in preparation for this debate certain influential journals had attempted to minimize the effect of the change now proposed, in order to attract into the very wide net which he had spread some big fish, whose adhesion to the cause was essential to the unity of the Party opposite. The hon. Gentleman had introduced the subject to the House in an eloquent speech; but he (Mr. Stanhope) regretted that his remarks were somewhat of a sensational nature. He referred to a good many names eminent in the history of the country, the bearers of which, if they had been present that evening, would, he was sure, be logical enough to admit that the principles enunciated by many of the supporters of the proposed change would go a great deal further than household suffrage, and that the adoption of the Resolutions before the House, as interpreted by their speeches, could never be regarded as a settlement of the question at issue, or as having anything like the character of finality. Even in the course of the discussion that evening, the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) did not seem indisposed to consider the subject of universal suffrage, while some of the propositions laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) appeared to him to go still further. If they were to adopt the principle of enfranchising everyone who had anything special to tell them, it would apply, not only to all men, whether householders or not, but to all women. Then there was the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen), and who, although he had not actually declared for manhood suffrage, had given some strong reason for the adoption of that system. The hon. Member for the Border Boroughs was followed by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), and they both together were somewhat like a double-barrelled gun in dealing with the subject. The clients of the former hon. Gentleman were, in the first place, the miners and skilled artisans living outside the borders of boroughs in our smaller country towns. But while we might freely admit the fitness of these men, speaking generally, for the franchise, and the anomaly of a system which gave a vote to a man living on one side of a line, and refused it to one who lived under precisely similar circumstances on the other, it was also impossible to deny that those men, as a class, were already largely represented in that House. There was no pretence for saying that there was in their case any special or exclusive class interest to which they were unable to direct the attention of the House, or to challenge the opinion of the country. It was, therefore, no disparagement to them, and no denial of their desire for a vote, to say that their claims did not appear to be of so urgent a character as to render it necessary merely for their satisfaction to introduce vital changes into the Constitution. Nor had it been represented by any hon. Gentleman who had spoken that the enfranchisement of this class would add strength to Parliament, or that it would make it more truly representative of the varied opinions and interests of the country. If, in fact, it was a pressing demand, as the hon. and learned Member for Oldham (Mr. Serjeant Spinks) seemed to think, it could be met by a much more simple measure than that now proposed—namely, by an extension of the boundaries of our boroughs. But the case of the agricultural labourers rested undoubtedly on a different footing. It was alleged that they were not represented in the House of Commons. They had, it was said, special aims and interests which they desired, but were unable to enforce. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), who spoke in that graceful attitude which all must admire, urged on behalf of the agricultural labourers that they had been called bad names and abused. Well, he should like to know who had abused them. He had heard them spoken of to-night as Pariahs and outcasts and so forth; but all those expressions proceeded from hon. Gentlemen opposite. If he (Mr. Stanhope) ventured to go into some details respecting this class, it was because during two years of his life he had had special opportunities of becoming acquainted with their condition, and also, he thought, with their interests and their objects. In passing, he might remark that they were already represented in that House. More than one hon. Member represented a rural borough containing a majority, or, at any rate, a large proportion of agricultural labourers voting under the franchise now proposed. More than one hon. Member—and they who represented the county of Lincoln had an especial claim to urge this point upon their attention—reckoned among his constituents a vast number of agricultural labourers who had obtained a right to vote by their own industry and frugality under the operation of the 40s. freehold franchise. Nobody could deny the educating effect of that franchise. Those who had attained to it were the pick of the agricultural labourers. Those who had already attained to it were proud of it, while those who had hitherto failed to obtain it were stimulated by the desire to do so to the exercise of qualities everybody must admire. Again, they were the most independent class of voters in the community. They were not afraid of telling their Representatives what they thought, and they might be pretty sure that their opinions would not be neglected. It was somewhat late in these days to hope for any large increase in that class of voters. But that evening hon. Members opposite had denounced this class of voters, if they were not resident. They had heard a good deal of faggot votes, but who first created faggot votes? Hon. Members opposite were, however, very fond of the 40s.

freeholder as long as they thought he would vote on their own side. They seemed to have forgotten the speeches of a man who would always be mentioned in that House with respect and veneration—the late Mr. Cobden—who thought he would be able to obtain the repeal of the Corn Laws by means of the 40s. freeholders. Mr. Cobden said—

“There is a large class of mechanics who save £40 or £50; they have been accustomed, perhaps, to put it in the savings bank. I will not say a word to undervalue that institution; but cottage property will pay twice as much interest as the savings bank. Then what a privilege it is for a working man to put his hands in his pockets and walk up and down opposite his own freehold and say—‘This is my own; I worked for it, and I have won it.’”

Again, Mr. Cobden said—

“When you have a son just coming of age, the best thing you can do is to give him a qualification for the county; it accustoms him to the use of property and the exercise of a vote while you are living, and can have a little judicious control over it if necessary.”

It was worthy of serious consideration how far it was desirable, by introducing this new class of voters in enormous numbers, to swamp the most independent class of voters in the country, and to destroy a special stimulus to the exercise of the most excellent qualities. The hon. Member for the Border Boroughs had asserted that the agricultural labourer was misrepresented in that House. He did not object so much to that assertion as he did to the statement made by the hon. Gentleman last year, or the year before, to the effect that county Members were afraid to express sympathy with the aims and objects of the great majority of the population resident within their constituencies. He altogether challenged that statement of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Members who sat for counties were as pleased as anybody else could be at the improvement which had occurred in the condition of that class; and, as the hon. Gentleman opposite always handsomely acknowledged, they had set an example of self-sacrifice and liberality in endeavouring to achieve it. But the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs went further, and tried to make out a case of special grievance. He (Mr. Stanhope) admitted that if it could be shown that there were wrongs under which the agricultural labourers suffered, and for which Parliament was unable or unwilling to provide a remedy, the case for their immediate enfranchisement was very much strengthened. But what were the facts? The hon. Member for the Border Boroughs had gone so far that evening as to bring in the Burials question, and argued that because the agricultural labourers did not possess the franchise the Dissenting Bodies were unable to make their feelings on the subject thoroughly understood in that House. But they had no special interest as a class in that subject, and it would be found, moreover, that in the quiet rural districts the burial grievance was hardly felt. Then there was a point which had not been alluded to that evening by the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs, but it was one that he was very fond of in his speeches, both in that House and out of it. Both he and also the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) were constantly saying that we ought to give direct representation to the agricultural labourers, because in that House hon. Members were willing to pass Factory Acts for artizans, while they were unwilling to pass them for agricultural labourers. [Mr. TREVILYAN: I never said it since last year.] He was glad to hear that the hon. Member had withdrawn the statement. But why had he withdrawn it? They were all much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Forster) for the Education Act passed in 1870: but the right hon. Gentleman would himself acknowledge that the crowning stone of the edifice, and the measure most strictly analogous to the Factory Acts, was carried by his noble Friend who sat upon these benches (Viscount Sandon), supported by hon. Members behind him, and not only not opposed, but welcomed by those very tenant-farmers who were said to be hostile to the interests of the agricultural labourers, and whose pockets were most directly affected. Then, again, the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs was very fond of referring to the character of the cottages and dwellings in the agricultural districts. There again he quite agreed with the hon. Member. He deplored as much as the hon. Member the deficiencies which existed; he welcomed the improvement which was gradually taking place; and as to legislation, if any satisfactory suggestion could be made on the subject, no one could doubt that the House would entertain it; but to talk, as some hon.

Members did, about the necessity of applying the principle of the Artizans' Dwellings Act, as it was, to rural districts, would be just as if he were to suggest the application of the Agricultural Holdings Act to Lincoln's Inn Fields. But the main reason of his referring to that subject was to point out, that although the improvement of cottages would be in their minds one of the chief objects to be desired, yet if they were to read the speeches and resolutions of the self-constituted leaders of the unions, it was not so. The very first union formed amongst agricultural labourers had expressly repudiated this being made one of their principal objects, and why? The reason was very plainly stated by Mr. Ball, one of the best known of their leaders, when he said that the improvement of cottages was not a thing to be especially looked to, because it weakened the action of the Executive at the time of a strike, and gave increased power to the employers of labour. The House ought, therefore, to make a distinction between what the agricultural labourers really thought and the views of those who professed to represent their opinions. The noble Lord the Member for the county of Carmarthen (Viscount Emlyn) had well pointed out the dangerous character of the proposals those men were venturing to urge on behalf, as they alleged, of the agricultural labourers, and had shown that they were endeavouring to make a war between classes. They were doing the greatest possible injury to the cause of the enfranchisement of these men. It was only too clear that their real object was not their social improvement, but by means of one class to attack other classes, and to introduce great changes into our political system. This must excite alarm in the minds of all reasonable and moderate men. They had heard the enfranchisement of the agricultural labourers urged on grounds of sentiment, and for other reasons; but he did not think that the proposal had that night been supported on the ground that it would be likely to improve the character or increase the usefulness of the House. It had not been represented that it was as yet ripe for consideration, and the noble Lord the Member for Calne had said that it had not assumed a practical shape. Even the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs seemed to agree in that opinion, for his Resolutions were of the vaguest possible character. But to form any opinion of the effect of these changes upon Parliament, it was necessary to pay some attention also to the subject of the second Resolution—the re-distribution of seats. Apparently, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) did not attach very much importance to that part of the subject—others, and among them the hon. Member for Hackney, believed that they might attain to the desired object by a moderate re-arrangement of existing constituencies, and they pointed, as a proof of their assertion, to the moderate re-distribution which was involved in the settlement of 1867. No comparison could be more misleading. The wholesale enfranchisement now proposed, the trebling of county voters, the admission of upwards of 1,000,000 voters, would so entirely upset the relation between the urban and the rural constituencies that they must either give an enormously increased representation to the counties, they must re-arrange the distinction between counties and boroughs, or they would fail to obtain that symmetry and uniformity and equality of representation which it was the object of these changes to introduce into our political system. Certainly, the noble Lord the Member for Calne could not be accused of making his alterations too moderate, as he had said that he could not be satisfied with sweeping away less than 150 of the present constituencies; but he had, as it seemed, not made up his mind whether he preferred the plural vote to the representation of minorities, nor did he give the House any reason to suppose that he would carry any large proportion of the House with him in proposing any such checks at all. But if they were to try to get rid of half the anomalies mentioned in the course of the debate, he did not see how they were to avoid approximating to, if they did not actually arrive at, a re-distribution of political power on the basis of population. And in order to illustrate the change, he would venture to direct their attention to one particular district—that included in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk—which he chose for no other reason than that if they were to allot the existing number of Representatives in proportion to the population, this district would retain nearly as many Members as at present. But what would the change be? They had at present in that House the Members representing the agricultural interest, returned there by a body of tenant-farmers, some of whom had made the farming of the district famous throughout the world, and one of whom, sent there by his brother farmers, was an ornament to that House, and partly by a body of freeholders, the most independent class of voters in the Kingdom. Then they had Members representing the trade and commerce of the district; two, sitting for King's Lynn, who claimed to speak to some extent also for the smaller maritime interests of the country; and, lastly, the noble Lord the Member for Eye (Viscount Barrington), who was returned by a majority of agricultural labourers under this very franchise. Well, it seemed to him that the variety of interests so represented, the opportunity given for the expression of the opinions of a minority, the certainty which every resident could not but feel that he was included in the political life of his country would be very ill replaced by a scheme which would produce a dull uniformity and crush the representation of every interest but one. In such a case the power of the minority would be as insignificant as it was in any place where all but the majority were absolutely excluded from power, as small as—well, it was very hard now to find any place where the minority was entirely and continuously shut out from political and municipal life and work, but he would say—as a Conservative voter living within the borough of Birmingham. But that was not all. Some of the constituencies within the district were small ones; and though, no doubt, the subject of small constituencies had been discussed ad nauseam, at any rate, he might say that they had been the means of introducing to the House many men whose want of wealth, or whose health or age prevented them from seeking the suffrages of a more extended constituency. To his mind these considerations raised great and serious issues. They were asked to enter upon a re-construction of the political system of England without a very clear idea of the object to be attained, or of the amount of change that would be desirable. Even the Ballot Act was at present only an experiment. Certainly, the experience that his side of the House had had of such changes gave him no special reason against them; but no man could tell without further experience what the ultimate effect of further changes would be upon the character and constitution of Parliament, or whether the sensitiveness of that House to the ebb and flow of public opinion out-of-doors was not already sufficient to satisfy even the most zealous advocate of representative institutions. These questions he would not now discuss. They might wait, but they must be considered some day. Were they prepared to sacrifice for their consideration the chance of useful legislation, perhaps for years to come? Were they prepared, before thoroughly realizing the effect of one change, to enter upon another and a wider one? Certainly, those of them who thought that this country—which had been well described as the model of representative institutions and the cradle of constitutional government—should hesitate long before it entered upon a renewed struggle between classes for political power, or abandon for an uncertain good the results of past experience, would give their votes against these vague and ill-timed Resolutions.

Mr. GOSCHEN said, that he had not troubled the House on the subject of Parliamentary Reform since the last Reform Bill; and while the proposal under consideration was at such a point that it did not command the unanimous assent of the Liberal Party, he had not thought it was necessary for him to express his views upon it. But it was no secret that that assent was now almost unanimous, and that the question had consequently passed into a different stage—one at which those who felt their responsibility were not entitled to shirk the expression of their opinions. When, therefore, he, in common with other hon. Members, was asked whether he thought it desirable to assimilate the county and the borough franchises, he was unable to support that proposition. He did not think that it was desirable now, as a political question, to advocate a uniform Parliamentary franchise for county and borough constituencies, nor was he prepared to admit that the time had arrived when it would be wise to re-distribute political power. He was told that the change was inevitable, and that, therefore, he ought not to hesitate to vote for it. He believed that there were many hon. Members opposite who thought, and who showed by their conduct that they believed that the assimilation of the county and the borough franchise was inevitable; and there were few of those connected with the great landed interests who had spoken against the Motion. He admitted that the change was inevitable, and that it would come soon—and in its widest form and with its greatest and largest effects—if both Parties in the House confined themselves to watching each other, in order to see that one might not steal a march on the other in winning the affections of the class to be enfranchised. ["Hear, hear!"]. If hon Members opposite held that opinion—as by their cheers they seemed to do—he was surprised that no man of position and influence on the other side, who commanded the respect and influence of the territorial classes had risen to say what they thought upon the proposal of his hon. Friend. There had been reticence on the other side of the House. What did that reticence mean? He left the House and the public who had read previous debates to judge; but he would say that the opinion was abroad in the country, and was rife in this House, that the Conservative Party would not speak out on this question, because they believed in their hearts that before long it would be undertaken by their Leaders. ["No, no!"] Well, there would be an opportunity of denying that assertion, if it could be denied. It had been the course of opinion in that House that that was the view of the Conservative Party; and so they were told that it was inevitable. He repeated that it was inevitable, and inevitable in its widest form and in its most serious consequences, unless men who had been silent on this subject hitherto were prepared to speak out and place before the House and the country the views which they entertained. What was the position of the House in regard to this matter? It seemed to him that it was not so very long ago since they passed the last Reform Bill. The debates of that time were still fresh in the memory of many of them; but it would seem when we heard this recital of the injustice, the anomalies, the grievances which flowed from the exclusion of the householder in the counties from the franchise, as if those debates belonged to the remote history, and that the course followed on that occasion was already forgotten. The second Parliament had not expired since we made that great constitutional experiment. What was that experiment? We not only introduced household suffrage at that time, but we reduced the county franchise from £50 to £12. It had been stated that evening that as we then gave household suffrage to the towns, the time was surely come when we must give it to the counties. But that same question was before us at the time the debates were conducted with regard to the reduction of the county franchise. He himself was a Member of a Government that proposed only 10 years ago that the county franchise should be a £14 rental, and he trusted that no hon. Friends of his would consider him an apostate Liberal if, after 10 years, he was unable to change his views and say that household suffrage was already necessary. In 1867 this question was debated, and owing to pressure from hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side, who, at the time, were in a majority, the county franchise was reduced from £50 to £15, and then from £15 to £12. It was proposed to reduce it to £10; but there was no proposal at the time that household suffrage should be given to the counties. But what was one of the arguments in favour of a £10 or £12 line? It was that if it were not adopted, there would be continued agitation, and that further agitation for household suffrage was not desirable. When the compromise was made, those arguments were urged, those grievances, which he admitted in the abstract as much as anyone, were brought forward; it was said that there would be men on both sides of the line, and on both sides of the street, the one enfranchised and the other not, that some men would have 300 times as much electoral power as others, and so on; but in the Bill which we accepted then, these anomalies were perpetuated, those grievances were considered and accepted, and a franchise was adopted which ought to be considered a settlement of the subject, at least for a time. Let us, then, look at the question of time, let us look at the experience we had gained and see whether we were safe in going forward, and whether having 10 years ago called 1,000,000 new electors within the pale of the Constitution, we should now do well to call in 1,000,000 more. He would, with the permission of the House, examine very briefly the experience of the last 10 years and make a survey, as it were, of the political situation. He did not wish to argue this matter controversially or dogmatically—he felt so much the force of many of the arguments used on that side of the House that he should be very averse from doing so; but as no other speaker had done so, he wished to ask the House to concentrate its attention, not so much upon the claims for admission, as upon the result of that admission upon the efficiency of Parliament and the future administration of the country. The proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Boroughs (Mr. Trevelyan) comprised two classes; a class of 500,000, who were almost precisely similar to those already enfranchised—namely, the urban voters; and a class of 500,000 of rural voters, with regard to whom there was no analogous class at present within the Constitution. Now, he wished to call attention to the case of the rural voters. The hon. Gentleman who had last addressed the House (Mr. Stanhope) had said that they had been called “Pariahs” on that (the Opposition) side. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Stansfeld) had no doubt said that they were “political Pariahs,” not intending, however, to depreciate the rural voters, as the hon. Gentleman opposite seemed to imply. He was sure no one in the House had such a desire. Now, he wished to call attention to two important distinctions between the rural and the urban voters. The first was, that the urban voters, even of the poorest class, had been for a long course of years familiarized to public duties by their local and municipal franchises. They had had a long course of semi-political education; and it was the glory and boast of the English Parliament that it possessed so much aptitude for representative government, because municipal institutions had qualified the people for so many years to take their part in the higher functions of government. But most unfortunately the rural voters had had no such privileges. They had not had that local life which would have qualified them for public duties; and it had been the earnest endeavour of many hon. Members on that side of the House to create that local life in the county parishes which would have qualified the rural voters for political duties, and he trusted he might be permitted to recall the fact that eight years ago he himself introduced a measure which would have conferred a suffrage for all local purposes on every householder in the Kingdom. But there was another difference between the urban and the rural voters. He was speaking of that plague spot upon our laws and our society—the Poor Laws. He could not exclude from his mind that the rural voters stood in a different position from the urban voters with respect to the Poor Law. The ordinary future of the agricultural labourer was, if he lived to a good old age, to end his days on the list of paupers, and there was scarcely a rural parish in which you would not see scores of old men who had been in respectable positions, but who were now either in the workhouses, or receiving out-door relief. Pauperism had eaten most seriously into our rural system, and into the whole organization of life in the country. It was under these circumstances that the House was asked to admit the rural voters, and to give them power to assist in the re-organization of the Poor Laws, which had for them, unfortunately, so deep an interest. And it was to be borne in mind when the House was asked to compare the position of the English peasant without a vote, with the position of the peasant in other countries with a vote, that the foreign peasant, as a rule, possessed property, and was attached to the soil, and that he did not depend, as unfortunately the English agricultural labourer so much depended, upon weekly wages first, and the organization of the Poor Law afterwards. He said, therefore, that he could not exclude from his mind the absence of previous training, and the great dependence on the Poor Laws of the class proposed to be enfranchised. He would pass from that subject, and he would admit with his hon. Friend that, speaking broadly, the 1,000,000 voters who were to be admitted to the Constitution would resemble those who had been admitted, and he would ask—what was the experience which they had already had of the newly-enfranchised classes, and the tendency of legislation since they had been admitted? In the debates in 1866, it was constantly asserted on the other side, that if they admitted those large numbers to the Constitution, they were incurring a grave political danger, and that our great institutions would probably be subverted. That was denied by the Liberal Party. That proposal at that time before the House was a modest one for admitting about 330,000 poor voters. But the numbers admitted in 1867 amounted to about 1,000,000. The experience which they had of the newly-enfranchised classes fully justified them, that in so admitting them they had not endangered the institutions of the country; and he believed that if they were to admit the whole of the numbers suggested by the Resolution proposed by this measure to-morrow, that those institutions would not be endangered. Those classes would be loyal to the country. He thought it was the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) who urged that the admission of such large numbers to the franchise would probably lead to Republicanism. But Republicanism was dead in this country. They might remember with great pleasure the interest with which the country watched the discussions on the Royal Titles Bill—and none watched them more closely than those classes which were newly enfranchised—and the desire that was expressed for the retention of the old name of the Queen. With this instance before him, he disclaimed the idea of there being any danger to the Sovereign, or to the institutions in the admission of any number, however great, within the electoral pale. Again, he thought that at this moment the position of the House of Lords was as strong as it had ever been; and if hon. Members opposite chose to contend that the admission of the last electors had added to the Conservative strength in that House, he did not care to dispute it. He believed that now all classes of the community were as loyally disposed to the Crown and to the institutions of the country as ever they had been. But, having admitted all this, when they were required to make so great a change in the Constitution, he still asked himself what our past experience of the last 10 years showed us of the temper of the newly-enfranchised class? Could we form any accurate idea of how they would be likely to bear the imposition of new taxation, or the denial of any of their favourite demands? Had we had any opportunity of testing those political virtues, the existence of which he did not deny, but of the presence of which he had no proof? What had been our experience of the conduct of the new constituencies in respect to finance? During the last 10 years the country had been so prosperous that neither Party had had to appeal to the self-sacrifice of any class of the community. Twice it had been necessary to find money, and on both occasions money was raised by the income tax, to which the newly-enfranchised class did not contribute. But—and this was a most serious consideration, to which he begged the attention of the House—on the second occasion it was thought necessary to popularize the re-imposition of an additional penny on the income tax by a system of exemptions which lightened the burden at the bottom, while it increased it at the top. He was not there to criticise either the mode of imposing the tax, or the tax itself; but he wished the House to take note that they had not yet before them any proofs that even the Conservative Government, with a large majority behind them, could pass any other than a Democratic Budget. They might be able to do so, the question had not yet arisen; but, if he might use the expression, our new levies had not yet been under fire. In the matter of legislation, again, had we seen any of their demands refused? During the past 10 years two Parliaments had existed, and two Governments had been in power. During the whole of the first five years public attention was absorbed by certain political questions; but, notwithstanding, two measures interesting the newly-enfranchised class passed. They gave them the Ballot, and also a comprehensive system of popular education. Then came the present Parliament, which, more than the other, had been deeply interested in social legislation, and had performed great services in that respect. The first measure proposed by the present Government, with the support of both sides of the House, was the Master and Servant Act, and a question much affecting the newly-enfranchised classes was satisfactorily settled. A number of other social questions were dealt with. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) had a Bill for shortening the hours of labour. The Government took it from his hands, and carried it, very much to the satisfaction of the newly-enfranchised classes. The hon. Member for Hastings (Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth) had an Artizans' Dwellings Bill in his hands; the Government took it from him; and again, a measure affecting the newly-enfranchised classes was carried. His hon. Friend the Member for

Mr. Goschen

Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had a Bill in regard to Commons in which popular constituencies felt a great interest; and the Government took it also into their hands, although they infused into it a certain Conservative spirit, making that permissive which otherwise would have been compulsory. Thus, in all these cases it would be admitted that, as financially the newly-enfranchised classes had been spared, so legislatively they had been gratified. He trusted he was not offending against the feelings of the House in recalling these matters. The moral he wished to draw in putting them forward was to show that the House had been so far consulting the wishes of the newly-enfranchised classes, and so far their admission to the Constitution had been a benefit. But the House had not had the opportunity of seeing how the case would be if matters had gone otherwise; and if there had been a demand made which the House could not conscientiously so readily concede. The hon. Member for the Border Boroughs had spoken of the Birmingham Sewage Bill. He admitted it was a gross case, and he could not conceive how the House of Commons had acted as it did on that occasion. But it only showed how anxiously the present House of Commons had been looking to the constituencies when the hon. Member could find no stronger case than that to prove that their demands had been resisted. Now, he did not say that the House ought to have resisted on any of those occasions, but he had no proof yet, and the House had no proof yet, that it would be able to resist, and that it was not already under the strong influence of numbers—of those numbers which the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs now proposed to double by his measures. He had spoken of finance and of legislation; let him approach a still more delicate question. He wished to know whether, in other respects besides actual legislation and finance, they saw any change in public opinion or in the opinion of that House—whether there were any marked signs that they were looking at matters from a different point of view from what they did 10 years ago. In his opinion there was a change. It appeared to him—though it might be an unpopular thing to say—that political economy had been dethroned in that House, and that philanthropy had been allowed to take its place. Political economy was the bugbear of the working classes, and philanthropy, he was sorry to say, was their idol. He wished to argue that matter in a serious way, and to state nothing that would grate on the susceptibilities of his Friends on his side; but he said with a deep conviction—and he could not retract the words—that political economy had no attractions for the working classes, either in this country, or out of it. They pointed to their Colonies, they pointed to France, and other Continental countries to show that Englishmen should have the same rights as the people there possessed. Of course, that meant universal, or manhood suffrage; and many of the arguments which had been used that night—for instance, the argument of justice, the argument of right, the argument of fitness—were all applicable to manhood suffrage. But he was not concerned with that. He wished to point out that in all Legislative Assemblies where numbers, and numbers alone, had been allowed to prevail, the doctrines of political economy had never been able to take root, but had, in many cases, been discarded and treated with contempt. Would they, he asked, have many more debates in that House in which political economy would be regarded? It was out of favour with many sections in that House. The Prime Minister denounced political economy in his famous speech at Glasgow, and said that his followers should no longer “gnaw the dry bones of political economy.” That, however, appeared to himself to have been a diet on which this country had thriven and prospered. But it was not merely on the Treasury Benches that political economy had been derided and denounced. There were many strong Liberals who believed that the doctrines of political economy meant the suppression of many efforts which ought to be encouraged, and that it was against the interests of the working classes. There was a marked difference between the modern Radical and the old Radical on that point. Modern Radicals were more in favour of that constructive legislation which was now so much engaging attention in this country. They were in favour of the view that Government should lay its hand upon every trade and remedy its abuses—adjusting the relations between capital and labour, and that Parliament should do what the old school of political economists and Radicals thought that men should do for themselves. It was the teaching of history that the reign of numbers endangered not the Throne, not the Constitution, not property—those were all bugbears—but political economy and the teaching which made Englishmen self-reliant. The old Radicals had been described as “the laggard disciples of an exploded school;” and he traced the attacks and the disregard to which political economy more and more subjected, in part to the new influences brought to bear upon the minds of Members of that House. He was, therefore, not ashamed once more to take up the cudgels on behalf of political economy, and he did not shrink from expressing his belief that those great doctrines of political economy which had contributed to the prosperity of the country and which had taught Englishmen to be self-reliant would be in serious peril if we surrendered to the idea that numbers, however respectable, however well-disposed, however loyal, were to decide on the legislation of that House. He believed that there was danger of the principles of political economy being more and more disregarded. They were more and more disregarded in that House. Under these circumstances, seeing that both as regarded finance, and as regarded legislation in general, and as regarded the attitude with which questions were reviewed in that House, they had so little experience of the results of the last Reform Act, and looking to the nature of that experience, limited as it was, he asked himself was it right to obey the summons of his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Boroughs? He regretted that he could not go with him. He admitted that the men proposed to be enfranchised were like the men who had already been taken in; but it was partly on that very account that he hesitated, because the last admitted represented numbers. It was not that he was afraid as to their fitness, afraid of them as individual voters; but before he went further he wanted to know what safeguards there would be that the class proposed to be enfranchised would not vote in such numbers as would overwhelm the expression of opinion of the other classes. He again asked that his views might not be misinterpreted, and might not be pushed beyond the point to which he wished to press them. He had considered most anxiously for weeks past, as a personal matter, whether he should speak on this occasion; and holding his convictions strongly and sincerely, he thought if they were well founded on facts, as he believed them to be, he should not be entitled to withhold them, or to suppress them, and not state them in the face of the House. He was sure every hon. Member of the House would admit that it was a painful task to him that, surrounded as he was by hon. Gentlemen for whom he had the deepest regard, he should have to express his dissent, and to mar by one jarring voice, even if it were one so feeble as his own, the expression of opinion of his Party. But the strength of his convictions appeared to him to throw a responsibility upon him which he was bound to discharge, and others had shown him the example of courage. There were hon. Members in that House who sat for counties whose constituents would not be too well satisfied with the vote which they should give to-night, but they thought it was their duty to support this measure, and they would do so at the peril of their seats. They had hon. Members representing small boroughs supporting the Resolutions for an extension of the franchise and for a re-distribution of seats. They would imperil their boroughs and their seats; but they held it was their duty to vote for this measure. They had the courage of their opinions. Well, he wished to show the same courage as they. He did not wish to skulk as a non-combatant in the rear of the battle, to remain uncommitted, ready to take advantage of any turn of events. It appeared to him that the question had reached a phase when reticence was unpatriotic. Constitutional prudence ought not to be allowed to go by default, and it would go by default, if hon. Members would not speak out. He therefore called on hon. Members in the conflicts which would ensue on this great question—whatever course those conflicts would take—whether of pressure from this side, or of resistance from that—to speak out manfully and bravely, and to put their opinions fully and fairly before the public. He trusted that no fear of the newly-enfranchised classes, that no reluctance to utter unpopular things, that no weak acquiescence in a supposed necessity would deter them from calling public attention and public vigilance to the great issues involved, or would induce them to withhold the frank expression of their views. It was with great regret, but without any misgiving as to his duty, that he should record his vote against the Resolution.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that he ventured to take part in the discussion at that advanced hour, because he felt that Irish interests were too much concerned in the progress of the liberties of England for him to remain silent. He was very much astonished at the tone which the discussion had assumed on the Government side of the House; but he was still more surprised by what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen). That right hon. Gentleman had made the confession, that if the agricultural labourer had been trained to exercise the franchise by local suffrage, by local power within the rural districts, that then, indeed, he might now support his admission to a larger sphere of it. The right hon. Gentleman had mentioned a Bill which had been introduced, which would have had the effect of training the agricultural labourer to deal with the larger question now proposed. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether that was not a distinct case of putting the cart before the horse? Was it likely that the great Party sitting on the other side of the House, which cherished so dearly their power in the rural districts, would be willing to train the agricultural labourers to the exercise of the franchise, and to commence their work by the reform of the rural squirearchy. He was satisfied with the premisses which appeared to be universally granted, which led to the conclusion that the agricultural labourers deserved the franchise, that they desired it, and that they ought to get it. The bugbear of finality had been raised. Although it might not be desirable to carry it into effect at the present moment, every right-minded man should look forward, as he did, with pleasure to the time when the whole country would be so advanced and educated that manhood suffrage could be granted without danger. He confessed that, as an advanced Liberal, he was not sorry at the great amount of opposition which was being offered by the Conservative Party to the enfranchisement of the agricultural labourer. A million votes were well worth straining after. He could not say what they might become, if the franchise was granted to them at once; but of this he was convinced, that every year of opposition to the just demands of the agricultural labourers was a year productive of wide conversions to advanced Liberalism of a class which might not come in to-day, or to-morrow, or for five years, but which must come in as thorough Liberals, thanks to the Conservatives and timid Liberals.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he had only been induced to rise at that late hour of the night by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London; but the right hon. Gentleman had shown such thorough distrust of the working classes, that as one of the Representatives of the largest body of the newly-created voters, his constituency, including 30,000 working-men electors in a total of 40,000, he felt bound to make some answer to the charge the right hon. Gentleman had brought against them. It had been said that the rural population had not had the political training of the urban voters. But six-tenths of the men proposed to be enfranchised were urban voters.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he had made the distinction; his remarks about the absence of political training had been solely directed to that portion who were rural voters.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that the new voters, according to the right hon. Gentleman, had never been called upon to bear their share of taxation. How had the income tax been popularized for the working classes? Who had been called on in the City of London to bear a share of the cost of education, and who had imposed upon themselves 4d. or 5d. in the pound, against the selfish appeals of that great City? Hon. Gentlemen opposite (Members for counties) opposed the expenditure asked for libraries. He should like to hear a definition of the working classes. When a man rose from the ranks, from the pay of daily labour, and by his working became possessed of a little shop, or a costermonger's barrow, or anything that raised him from the necessity of earning his bread daily by the sweat of his brow, they claimed him as a member of the middle classes. If he raised himself still higher, and became a landholder, a mineowner, or a Member of that House he became a member of the upper ten thousand. How many hon. Members opposite could trace their money back for two generations?

How many of them were self-made men? He had heard one say that he began his career at the bottom of a coal mine, and it was honourable to him thus to have succeeded. What about the degradation, and that process of precipitation which was constantly going on? All the cream that came to the surface was claimed as belonging to their class. Was it exclusively the working classes who were now disfranchised? He held in his hand a letter from the Rev. Edward Stevens, giving an account of the town of Loughborough, the polling town for the division of the county represented by the noble Lord the Postmaster General (Lord John Manners). The town had 13,000 inhabitants, of whom only 554 were county electors. The school board consisted of seven members, four of whom were non-voters. There were 16 clergymen in the town, 12 of whom had no votes. Of the schoolmasters, including the master of the Grammar School, there were 12, not one of whom had a vote. Besides, the town was one of more than average intelligence, and he asked were these the class of persons whom the right hon. Gentleman dreaded so much? In the last Parliament, when he introduced a very mild labour Bill, he was opposed by the noble Lord the Member for North Nottinghamshire (Viscount Galway), and he should now give the story of one of the largest towns in that county which he had received in a letter from one of the most intelligent working men he had ever met. The town had a population of 10,000. There were seven members of the school board, of whom only one, who happened to be the vicar, had a vote. Of all the ministers of religion—15 in number—only one had a vote. The man who gave him this information was secretary of the Board of Arbitration which had existed for 19 years; he was an honour to the working classes, and would do honour to that House, yet he had not a vote. The town of Rotherham—a corporate borough—had 6,616 houses, and a population of 31,500, yet only 1,000 of these householders had a vote. According to the letter he had received these non-voters included not only working men, but clerks, shop assistants, managers, sub-managers, members of the school board, elementary teachers, and even some members of the corporation. They had great experience in local government, and were perfectly capable of exercising the suffrage which the right hon. Gentleman would deny them. Another argument in favour of the proposal was the changes of area that were going on. The House had heard a great deal of the boundaries of Nottingham and Derby during the present Session. The area of Nottingham had been increased six-fold during the Session, and while one-sixth enjoyed household suffrage, five-sixths were outside the borough, where the county suffrage deprived great numbers of their votes. The House had added very largely to the boundaries of Derby; but it had not given the franchise to those who were now included. With regard to the rural population, he only wished the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Gentlemen opposite, who talked of their want of political education, had been present at the recent meetings at Exeter Hall and had seen for themselves what they were like. He wished the right hon. Gentleman was better acquainted with the industrial and rural districts of the country. He (Mr. Goschen) had been a Liberal and the Liberal Party had been proud of him, but he had advanced to a point where he had ceased to be a Liberal. This was a question which it was impossible to stop. If they dammed it up, the stream would burst and carry off their barriers with it. If they refused this equality between town and county, and would not admit the principle that the householder, the head of the family, was the person who should have the right to elect those who made the laws and imposed the taxes, then he said there was something more in store for them. They would have a demand for household suffrage, and they would have to yield it. He had no hesitation in saying that when that demand came he should not be the one to draw back from it. If it came in his time, it would be the fault of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who had not had the courage to draw the line where it could now be drawn with perfect safety and satisfaction to the whole community.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), in the course of his courageous and remarkable speech, made some observations which he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) thought implied a desire to elicit from Her Ma-

esty's Government some more definite expression of opinion on the Resolutions than he had been able to collect up to that time. The Government had no difficulty in expressing an opinion on the Resolution before the House, and if they had taken no large share in the debate, it had not been from reluctance or hesitation as to the language they should use, or as to the course they should pursue. The question was not new in the present Parliament; it had been brought forward by the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs (Mr. Trevelyan) twice or thrice, and on each occasion the Government had expressed their views, which they saw no occasion to change. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Board of Trade (Mr. Stanhope) had already, with the ability and eloquence which distinguished him, expressed on behalf of the Government their view of the question, and had indicated the course they would take, which there could be no doubt was to oppose the Resolutions. They did not regret that there had been an opportunity for the discussion of the Resolutions, the real importance of which was that it afforded hon. Members who took a keen interest in Parliamentary representation an opportunity of stating what their views were and to what they were tending, because such propositions as were put forward in the Resolutions might bear a wholly different signification according to the principle on which they were put forward and advocated. If extension of the franchise and re-distribution were pressed in order to gain some point of practical convenience, or to improve the composition of the House, the question might be discussed with reference to the time, the opportunity, and the particular character of the change desired; but if the claim to the franchise was made on the ground of abstract right; if the demand was put forward that every man presumably fit to exercise the franchise should be admitted to share it, they found themselves placed in an altogether different position; and it was important that hon. Members should speak out and express their minds on the questions at issue. They had had the advantage of hearing the argument on the principle of abstract right. The demand for it had been broadly and openly stated by several advocates of the Resolutions—by the Mover, the Seconder, and the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), and boldly and unhesitatingly by the right hon. Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen), who declared his belief in the abstract right of the citizens of this country to claim the franchise and his readiness to admit in principle the doctrine of manhood suffrage. In this way something was gained by discussion. In former years there had been some doubt as to what was really aimed at; now they were beginning to see what it was the advocates of the measure were aiming at; and he agreed with the right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) that it was their duty to speak out boldly, frankly, and unmistakeably, and to say that they were unable to accept, and, on the contrary, they distinctly repudiated the inevitable result of the doctrine put forward by the advocates of the Resolutions; they believed it to be a doctrine which could not be entertained in consistency either with what they believed to be the principles of the Constitution of this country, or the true interests of the country. They could not admit that every citizen presumably had the right to such an arrangement of our electoral system as should give him a vote, regardless of any of the consequences of the arrangement which must be necessary in order to effect it. They could not admit that those who did not possess the franchise were thereby slighted or were on that account subjected to any slur or stigma. It was an incident in the Constitution of the country which might or might not be unsatisfactory; it might or might not be desirable at some time to make changes in the distribution of electoral power which would admit those who were at present excluded; but he wholly denied that at present they had any natural right, or that a wrong was done them, if for the sake of maintaining a good, convenient, and proper electoral system they were excluded from the franchise. That was a point on which it was desirable that hon. Members should be clear, because they must fairly face the question and must not satisfy themselves with saying—"We do not admit the general principle of manhood suffrage, or universal suffrage; but we think those persons on whose behalf this particular claim is put forward have as good a right to the franchise as others who reside in towns, and that what has been given to the latter may very well also be given to the former." But those who spoke in that way must recollect that they could not stop at that point. His right hon. Friend the Member for Sandwich found himself obliged to qualify his demand for the absolute right to manhood or universal suffrage by certain limitations. But why those limitations? What purpose were they to serve? The man who did not occupy a house of his own had the same rights as a citizen, he presumed, as the man who did. There were many men who by their education, by the services which they had rendered to the State in their walks in life, by their character, and other considerations, had a good and natural right to have their interests represented, and to be themselves represented in that House, although they did not happen to be the owners of the houses in which they resided. But his right hon. Friend was of opinion that some limitation should be put upon that right for the sake of public convenience. But that was also a reason why, in order that inconvenient results might not be produced in the composition of that House, it had been found necessary to limit in certain cases the rights of those to whom at present the franchise was not extended. Then came the question with respect to the re-distribution of seats. There, again, it became necessary to consider whether the question should be dealt with as one of principle, or as a matter of convenience. The question had undoubtedly been brought forward by his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Boroughs, not as forming in his mind the first point to which attention should be directed; but because when he asked for the extension of the suffrage, he was met by the observation that it was necessary to have a re-distribution of seats, and he was challenged to say whether he was prepared for such a re-distribution. He did not inform the House that he had raised the question for any other purpose but to meet that difficulty. His Secunder, the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke), however, put the matter in a different way, because he had told the House, in point of fact, that a man should not only have the franchise, but an equal and proportionate right to share a Member with anybody else. The hon. Baronet had pointed to the anomaly that Members representing smaller constituencies and a minority of the electors, might nevertheless swell the majority in the House, and carry a question in opposition to the wishes of the electors. That, the hon. Baronet contended, was unjust, and in that way, of course, at once urged the House to the formation of equal electoral districts; and not only of equal electoral districts, created now or next year, once for all, but of a system of a periodical character, as population shifted and increased in one direction or another. Indeed, the hon. Baronet's argument would go further, because, as he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) understood it, it might be illustrated in rather a ludicrous way, being really equivalent to what he remembered was suggested many years ago, that a Member should not only give a vote in that House, but that he should deposit on one or two scales weights proportionate to the number of his constituency, and that according as the scales went down on one side or the other, the electors should be held to be represented, the weight put in being counted in the votes of the House. The argument of the hon. Baronet hardly fell short of that suggestion; and if the House of Commons were to go on that line of argument, it would come before long to the conclusion that hon. Members sent to it to represent a numerical body of their constituents must also act as delegates; because if every man had a right to an adequate part of a Member to represent him, he might fairly say he was also entitled to claim that that Member should, on every question which came before him, vote as he required, and thus we should be brought to a state entirely destructive of the free, ancient, and honourable character of the British House of Commons. He was not, he might add, prepared to go the extreme length of some, who looked upon the object of our electoral system as being simply that of producing the best possible machinery for legislation. It was desirable that they should try not only to get the best possible machine for making laws, but also to have a broad and fair representation of the general views of the constituencies. A more excellent Assembly resting on too narrow a basis might not be so desirable as a less excellent Assembly resting on a broader basis. That, he thought, must be admitted. On the other side of the argument, however, he thought that hon. Gentlemen who desired to broaden the basis were bound to admit that it ought not to be so broadened as really to diminish the usefulness of that branch of the Legislature as a legislative machine; and he thought that the arguments which had been put forward with such eloquence and force and truth by the right hon. Member for the City of London, as to the uncertainty which must still be felt with regard to the exact effect of all that had recently been done in the way of an alteration in our representation, and with regard to the necessity of allowing some time to elapse before changing what had not yet been fairly put to the test—namely, the actual bearings of our electoral system, were arguments which ought to command the respectful consideration of the House. They did not attempt to put the matter upon what was called the "finality" footing. It was impossible to say that as the population altered, as well as increased, and as the circumstances of the country changed, it might not, from time to time, be necessary to make some alterations in the distribution of political power and in the incidence of their electoral system. Some towns would decay, others would spring up in their places. It was but right that the smaller should give place to the larger, and that, from time to time, changes of that sort should arise. But he maintained confidently that that was an operation which ought not to be rashly, or frequently undertaken. It ought not to be undertaken in a hasty, or ill-considered, or in any other than the most careful manner. There was a great Reform Bill passed in 1832, and another great Reform Bill was passed 35 years afterwards. It was not reasonable that within 10 years of that last change we should be again thinking of change. No, the time had not yet come—it was not even close at hand—for making any further alterations. That time ought not to be anticipated, when it would be possible without inconvenience to the business and Constitution of the country to re-consider these matters which had formerly been considered at an interval of more than a generation. What he would urge was, that they should lay aside for the present those attempts to pass abstract Resolutions, which could not be followed by anything in the nature of immediate legislative action. This was not the time—and he thought that hon. Members who supported the Resolutions must feel in their hearts that it was not the time—for undertaking a great constitutional change. Many of them remembered the incidents of the last great constitutional change. They remembered the controversies to which it gave rise, the feelings which it excited, and the interruption which it caused to many measures of importance. It was, therefore, undesirable to be re-opening and renewing these questions at the present time; and if it was undesirable to be re-opening and renewing them, surely it was undesirable to be passing abstract Resolutions which they did not see their way to carry into effect. That was not a small matter, but one which cut very deep. Whenever it might be raised in a practical form it would open up enormous issues. They had been told, for example, that they would have probably to deal with no fewer than 150 seats. Well, he would ask, were hon. Members prepared—did they think it desirable in the interests of the nation—on the strength of a plea, which he thought a dangerous plea, and one of a wholly unsubstantial character, to plunge the country into a controversy which would necessarily be of the nature of an agitation, and which would arouse a great deal of feeling which it was desirable not to arouse—and for what? For a change which would lead them no one could tell where. They would, in making it, be embarking on a great and dangerous ocean, without a pilot, and without a course marked out for them to sail by. In these circumstances he felt, and Her Majesty's Government felt, that they had no alternative but to resist the Motion of the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he felt he had but little right to ask the indulgence of the House, even for a short time, in addressing it on this subject. It was a question on which he had not, up to the present time, given a vote; and as he might, therefore, be presumed to have been in some doubt and hesitation with regard to it, it was hardly for him to seek to influence the votes of hon. Members on the present occasion. He wished, however, with the indulgence of the House, to say a few words as to the reasons why he now intended to support the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Boroughs (Mr. Trevelyan). When he last addressed the House upon the question a few years ago, he said that in his view there were a few questions upon which they should abstain from giving an opinion, but circumstances justified the course which he then took. The question he had now to consider was whether this was one of those questions, and whether the circumstances in which the Resolution was brought forward were of such an exceptional nature as to justify him in continuing in the course which during the last three or four Sessions he had pursued. The extension of the franchise was by almost universal consent a question of time, and time only. It must by universal consent be considered, and they had heard nothing from the Treasury Bench which weakened that opinion. The change advocated by his hon. Friend would, sooner or later, be made, and the question really before them was, when that change ought to be made, and whether it ought to be accompanied by a more or less considerable re-distribution of political power. When the subject was brought before the House in the early Sessions of the present Parliament, he would acknowledge he was of opinion that the time chosen for discussing it was not an extremely favourable one. A period of very considerable legislative activity had followed the Reform Act of 1867, and the country afterwards showed in an unmistakeable manner that it desired an interval, at all events, of repose; and the result was a Government pledged to "silence and consideration." But circumstances were now, to a certain extent, altered. The present Parliament, although it might have a period to run, was approaching its dissolution, having passed its meridian, and the time was consequently not far distant when the constituencies and the country would have an opportunity of saying whether there should be another epoch of repose, or whether the Government must give consideration to that and other questions, and whether the question should be faced with earnestness or not. Under such circumstances, he could not think that it was right not to state his opinion on the subject. On the contrary, it was not the duty of anyone who aspired, however imperfectly, to guide the counsels of any of the great Parties in that House to abstain from giving an opinion upon the present question. Whether the claim now put forward on behalf of the county householders was well-founded or not, the county householders and the country ought to know what was the attitude of each of the great Parties in the House in relation to it. They had a right to know whether the House was prepared to take it up and push it forward by every constitutional and legitimate means, or whether it was, though not to be absolutely refused, yet to be delayed, and to be taken up when difficulties and doubts arose, and when there might be political dangers, or when political advantages might be expected from the granting of the demands made. If the county householders had a right to ask the question, what answer was to be given to them? A statement of the question seemed to him almost to convey the inevitable answer—they had large classes excluded from political power. It was admitted by all, even by his right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), with a trifling exception, as a fact that political power was possessed by classes in the same position as those who were excluded, but who were no fitter to exercise it. It would not be denied that those classes also had interests of their own; though not in opposition to, yet not identical with, those of the enfranchised classes—interests which were as worthy of being considered as those of the represented and enfranchised classes, and it was not alleged that there would be any political danger in granting to those new classes the franchise. With the exception of his right hon. Friend, no speaker who had opposed the Motion had argued that there was any social or other danger involved in the proposition. He had heard with great admiration, but at the same time with great regret, the speech which his right hon. Friend had delivered. Still, he thought a more courageous speech had seldom been delivered in that House. Instances had not been rare of politicians who had made promises and supported principles when in Opposition which they had shrunk from giving practical effect to when they came into power; but he believed the instances were rare in which any man, ambitious, as his right hon. Friend naturally was, of serving his Party and the State, had voluntarily incurred a considerable amount of unpopularity with those among whom he sat by refusing to espouse a cause that was almost universally taken up by his Party. Much, however, as he admired the courage with which his right hon. Friend had expressed his opinions to-night, he doubted whether the fears, the doubts, and the hesitations which his right hon. Friend had expressed rested upon any solid foundation. Still more did he doubt whether, if the dangers his right hon. Friend spoke of were real which they might have to confront, or that they were to be apprehended from the classes whom it was proposed to enfranchise. His right hon. Friend was doubtful about the finance of the newly-enfranchised classes; but he would ask him whether the finance of the newly-enfranchised classes was the only finance in the history of the country that had been found to be unsound, and whether newly-enfranchised classes were the only ones who had adapted their financial policy to the interests of those with whom they were connected? His right hon. Friend also doubted the political economy of newly-enfranchised electors. It was true the late constituencies did, after a long struggle, so far yield to the principles of political economy as to remove the Corn Laws and other protective duties, but he doubted very much whether the pressure of necessity and of famine itself had not more to do with the removal of those protective restrictions than any adherence to the sound principles of political economy. His right hon. Friend viewed with some alarm and distrust the philanthropic and Socialist tendencies of the newly-enfranchised constituencies. But let him (the Marquess of Hartington) remind his right hon. Friend that perhaps the greatest step in legislation of that description was taken not by new, but by the old restricted constituencies. He referred to the Factory Acts, against which he had not a word to say, any more than his right hon. Friend had a word to say against the legislation of the late and the present Parliaments. The legislation in regard to the Factory Acts—the first step in the paternal, the philanthropic, and, if he might use the word, the Socialistic

on which his right hon. Friend—was undertaken by a Parliament elected by restricted constituencies, as supported, as they had never to be, by many hon. Gentlemen of the Conservative Party. But what about his right hon. Friend might be his apprehensions of the tenor of the new constituencies, and from the Motion proposed to add to, he feared that his argument, whole, rested at last upon a point which it was too late for him or any else to seek to occupy. He went through the whole of his argument that the franchise was dependent upon some supposed right of the possessors of the franchise, but that was the ground which had now been abandoned. That evening they had heard a good deal of the "machinery" of Parliament; and, no matter if the only object of representative institutions were to provide the perfect machine, it would have to be produced in a very different way. Surely there were many contrivances which would produce an Assembly with more knowledge of political economy, of constitutional history, of law, of logic, reason, and common sense than the existing machinery. The country had always prospered upon the principle that the House of Commons was to be, as far as possible, a representation of the people of the country. And, though a House of Commons so elected often do foolish things, they yet did that the laws which were made by a House so elected would be more readily obeyed, that the policy adopted by a House so elected would be more fully supported, and that the institutions which were associated with a House so elected would be more cherished and venerated, and respected than could be the case under the most imperfect system of election by which any one could conceive. For these reasons he doubted whether the doubts and hesitations of his right hon. Friend were justified; but whether they were or not, they were apparently felt by the House by himself alone. ["No, they were not shared by Her Majesty's Government, and neither on this or on any former occasion, had it been said against the principle of the Motion. The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had said that he would oppose the Motion; and that if he and others had not risen earlier in the evening, it was because they relied on arguments that had appeared before, and which they had not thought it necessary to repeat. But, unless his (the Marquess of Hartington's) memory deceived him, the Prime Minister had more than once, as fully as his hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) could desire, assented to everything that had been said about the enfranchisement of the agricultural labourers, and rested his opposition to that measure solely upon the fact that it involved the re-distribution of seats. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Stanhope) had argued against the Resolutions, but had said not one word against their principle. The argument of the hon. Gentleman was an ingenious one; but it only went to show that the necessity for the proposal was not proved. The hon. Gentleman, indeed, admitted a certain grievance on the part of the artisan class who lived immediately outside the boundaries of Parliamentary boroughs, and he suggested a remedy. But what was that remedy? It was simply the extension of the boundaries of Parliamentary boroughs. In other words, he suggested that the franchise in those boroughs, where the electors now possessed the smallest show of electoral power, should be still further diluted by the admission of a large number of persons who lived in the outskirts. But with regard to the agricultural labourer, the hon. Gentleman did not advance one argument against his admission to the franchise, but only suggested some reasons for believing that his interests were sufficiently attended to, and that he did not require for his protection the immediate possession of a Parliamentary vote. If, then, with the exception of his right hon. Friend, there was no one who argued against the proposition before the House on the ground of principle, on what grounds were we asked to oppose it? Simply on the ground that we were weary of the subject of Parliamentary reform, and that we were unwilling to grapple again with the many difficulties which surrounded it, and especially with those which surrounded the question of re-distribution of political power. Now, he would say that these were not grounds upon which we could long resist the reality of this demand. These were grounds which would be sufficient for resisting an unreal, sham demand, based upon some sentimental aspirations; but they were not grounds upon which a claim such as this could be permanently resisted. He did not deny the good faith with which the plea for delay was put forward. He had himself felt, perhaps as strongly as any hon. Gentleman, a disinclination to enter again upon the most difficult, as well as the most important, question of Parliamentary Reform. He felt, he admitted it, the enormous difficulties of the question. But as to the disinclination to re-open the question of Parliamentary Reform, he might remind the House, that the responsibility rested not with hon. Gentlemen on that side, but with hon. Gentlemen opposite, who, when the whole question was before them 10 years ago, when they had made up their minds to deal with one part of it in a broad and comprehensive manner, shrank from dealing with the rest of the question upon a permanent and satisfactory basis. It might have been foreseen—he had no doubt it was foreseen by many—that the county franchise could not be left in the position in which it was left after that great concession had been made in the matter of the borough franchise. And it was in the recollection of them all that upon that side of the House there was not one hon. Member who professed to believe that the trifling re-distribution of seats under the Act of 1867 would prove satisfactory. As to the difficulties of the re-distribution of seats, he had admitted that he could see difficulties; but, at the same time, he thought those difficulties might easily be exaggerated. As had been pointed out by his hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), the necessity of re-distribution existed already. There were anomalies of an importance and magnitude which could hardly be exaggerated, and new disproportions, frequently brought about by the increase of the county electors, only added a fresh element to the consideration of the question, and could not be said to create a new necessity, only adding to that which already existed. At that hour of the night he would not trouble the House by going into figures on the question.

There were some which had made a great impression on the House, and, he believed, on the country. There were some given by the present Prime Minister in order to point out the great disproportion which would be caused by the extension of the county franchise between the number of the county and the borough electors, and which, in his opinion, would tend to the creation of electoral districts. He (the Marquess of Hartington) thought it might be shown that there was considerable fallacy in those figures. It had been shown that there was a large and increasing population in counties, so that the disproportion pointed out by the Prime Minister as existing between counties and boroughs was really to a great extent an anomaly. But this was no doubt a great question which Parliament would, sooner or later, have to consider, and the sooner Parliament made up its mind to consider it, the milder and smaller would be the measure which it would be necessary to adopt. He believed there was no desire to disfranchise any community which had anything that could be called a separate, actual, and progressive existence of its own. He believed there was no desire to cut up the country into large electoral districts. But he thought, at the same time, it must be admitted a great many small constituencies still survived, which did not represent anything in particular but local prejudice, local selfishness, and local pride which it was not for the advantage of the public to continue. It must also be admitted that the extension of the suffrage to great cities and counties would not only give satisfaction and contentment to those cities and counties, but afford opportunities to many for entering Parliament who could not now obtain admission. Without detaining the House any further, he would only say that as it was now, he supposed, vain to hope that the present Parliament, in the time which remained to it would attempt to deal with and settle that question; still, in his opinion, its discussion within those walls during the existence of that Parliament could not be without its effect in the way of benefit. As he had said, the country would soon have to decide whether it would face this and other great questions at the next Election, or whether it would decide in favour of another period of repose and silence; and he earnestly hoped that the result of that and other debates which might be held in that House in the interval would be to induce the country to take up the matter once more in earnest, so as without haste and without passion—as might now easily be done—but at the same time without hesitation and without timidity, that long-standing question might be settled on a basis which would hold out some prospect of permanence.

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to raise further sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of Five Hundred Thousand Pounds, for the purposes of the Telegraph Acts, by the creation of Three per Cent. Capital Stocks of Annuities, chargeable on the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.

MOTION FOR A RETURN. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM moved for a Return showing the amount of money granted by the Irish Parliament for the formation of the Royal Canal between the River Liffey at Dublin and the River Shannon, and for the amount of money granted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to the Inland Navigation Commissioners to complete the Royal Canal from the River Liffey at Dublin and the River Shannon. The noble Earl said, the canal was first commenced by a Company who borrowed money of the Irish Government, and mortgaged the canal. They now came forward, not as a canal Company, but as a railway Company, asking Parliament for an extension of powers, and inserted canal clauses in the Bill. In making this Motion, he desired to ask, Whether it was intended to reserve the power which the Irish Government still possessed of not allowing the property in the Royal Canal to be mortgaged without the sanction of the Lord Lieutenant?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he saw no objection to the production of the Return moved for; but requested the noble Earl to repeat his Question on another occasion, as his Notice had not sufficiently indicated its purport for him to be able to answer it.

Motion agreed to; Return ordered.

INCLOSURE OF COMMONS.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

EARL BEAUCHAMP presented a Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Inclosure Commissioners for the inclosure of lands situate in Barrowden, South Luffenham, and North Luffenham in the county of Rutland, and at Riccall in the county of York; and moved that so much of the Order of the 23rd of April, 1877, as related to the first reading of Inclosure Bills be suspended in reference to the said Bill, and that the said Bill be read a first time. Injustice would be done and great improvements would be delayed unless this Standing Order were suspended in reference to this Bill, and he hoped their Lordships would agree to the Motion.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE said, he would not object to the Motion in this case; but he must remark that there was no use in making Orders unless they were attended to. There could be no reason why parties should not have their Bills ready at a much earlier period of the Session.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 1st accordingly; to be printed; and referred to the Examiners.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

POST OFFICE—EDINBURGH RECEIVING HOUSE.—QUESTION.

MR. M'LAREN asked the Postmaster General, If he will state the reasons for the proposed removal of the receiving Post Office, from Gladstone Place, Edinburgh, (in opposition to the wishes of a large number of Petitioners against such removal) to Argyll Place, which the Petitioners consider much less convenient; and, whether, he is aware that the shop to which it is proposed to be removed is licensed for the sale of exciseable liquors, and that the shop in Gladstone Place is not so licensed?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, it was found on inquiry that the office would be likely to be of more use in the latter place. The memorial against the alteration had not been received until the 25th of June, and the shop to which the office had been removed was not licensed for the sale of liquors to be consumed on the premises.

RUSSIA—HON. COLONEL WELLESLEY, MILITARY ATTACHE.—QUESTION.

LORD FRANCIS CONYNGHAM asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether due explanation has been made to Colonel Wellesley, Military Attaché in Russia, of the discourtesy of his reception at the Russian head quarters on the Danube; whether facilities have been given to him to discharge the duties of his office, equal to those given to the military representatives of other neutral powers with the Russian Army; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table of the House any Correspondence which has taken place on the subject?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, Colonel Wellesley has reported that nothing could be more satisfactory than the manner in which he was received on the 27th ult. by Prince Gortchakoff. He had been desired to repair to His Majesty's head quarters, where he was told he would be perfectly well received both by the Emperor and the Grand Duke. He is to be attached in the same manner as his German and Austrian colleagues. There is no official correspondence which can be presented to the House. The communications which have been exchanged with the Russian Government have been of a formal character.

NATIONAL GALLERY — DAVID ROBERTS, R.A.—QUESTION.

MR. COLLINS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true that two paintings by the late David Roberts, R.A. (one of them said to be his masterpiece) were recently offered by Mrs. Bunning, widow of the late City Architect, to the Trustees of the National Gallery; whether he is aware that the offer has been declined; and, if he will inform the House of the grounds of refusal to accept them?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, it was true that two paintings by the late David Roberts, R.A., were received at the National Gallery under the will of the late Mr. Bunning. It was also true that they were not accepted by the Trustees. The ground upon which the pictures were declined was, he was informed, that after careful examination they did not appear to the Trustees to be of sufficient excellence as compared with many other works of Mr. Roberts to represent fairly that distinguished painter in the national collection. It required a considerable exercise of care on the part of the Trustees in order to secure that a painter should be properly represented, and the National Gallery already possessed two very beautiful works of Mr. Roberts.

WEXFORD.—QUESTION.

MR. REDMOND asked the Postmaster General, If any charge of irregularity or other complaint was made to the Irish Post Office with reference to the management of the Post Office at Camolin, county of Wexford, during the time that office was in charge of Miss F. M. Keogh, as acting Postmistress and as assistant to her father the late Postmaster; and, if he will be good enough to state upon what grounds Miss Keogh was removed and another person appointed in her place?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: No complaint has been made as to the management of the Camolin Post Office during the time it was in charge of Miss Keogh as acting postmistress and as assistant to her father, the late postmaster; but it cannot be said that she was removed in consequence of any irregularity which was complained of during that time, inasmuch as she never held any appointment, and when the office became vacant, it was filled up by the Treasury in the usual manner.

ACT, 1869—CONVICTIONS—CATTLE

QUESTION.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a decision given by two magistrates of the East Riding of Yorkshire against Mr. John Metcalfe of Snainton, and Mr. William Swanwell of Fowbridge, for a breach of the Cattle Plague Regulations; whether fines of £10 and of £5, with costs, were not inflicted upon these gentlemen for having moved cattle from one place to another, though they had obtained a licence from the magistrates authorizing the removal of the cattle; whether the defendants were not fined for acting upon a licence which they thought to be valid, which the magistrates had granted, but which, being ignorant of the Law, they had no right to grant; and, whether, in such circumstances, he will consider whether he might not advise that the fine be remitted?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the affair occurred at a time when there was great danger of the spread of the cattle disease in Yorkshire. The magistrates, therefore, might have deemed it to be their duty to construe the law with the greatest strictness. He had been told that, although it was true that one of the gentlemen in question had obtained a pass for his cattle, in the opinion of the magistrates, that had nothing to do with the case; because, as a large dealer in cattle, he ought to have made himself acquainted with the law relating to their removal. The rules on the subject which were framed by the local authorities were perfectly clear and distinct, and had been published in all the local newspapers, as well as posted up in various parts of the county. The case, therefore, had nothing to do with the granting of any licence, for the notice stated that from the date of its publication no cattle could be brought from any part of the East Riding. There was thus an absolute prohibition on the removal of cattle, with which the dealers ought to have been acquainted, and he had not in the circumstances deemed it right to interfere in the matter. He thought it possible that the magistrates might have signed the licences under the impression that the cattle might go through the Riding.

LONDON).—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can now inform the House what course the Government intends to take with the view of remedying the grave abuses which, as pointed out in the recent Report of the Charity Commissioners, exist in the administration of certain parochial charities in the City of London?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had been in communication with the Charity Commissioners on the matter. They had referred to it in their Report, and had since sent him (Mr. Cross) further particulars in reference thereto. Undoubtedly, the first step the Government would take would be to confer with the parochial authorities upon the matter. The only question was, whether any further legislation was necessary or not, because further legislation could not be proceeded with at this period of the Session, and he hoped that before the next Session of Parliament other means might be found by which the abuses complained of might be remedied.

DUNOW PETTY SESSIONS CLERKSHIP.
QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is a fact that a Mr. Palmer has been elected petty sessions clerk at Dunow, county Kilkenny. Mr. Palmer being clerk in the rent office of Viscount Ashbrook, a Mr. Hare, agent to Lord Ashbrook, being seconder of the nomination; if the above facts are truly stated, whether if it is within his power to put aside the appointment, he will do so?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I understand that Mr. Palmer, the person referred to in the Question, has been a clerk in Lord Ashbrook's office, and that his nomination was seconded by Mr. Hare. I am further informed that he is a gentleman of good intelligence and education, and that the Registrar of Petty Sessions Clerks, having examined him as to his knowledge of the duties of his appointment, considers him fully qualified to perform them. It is stated that he was unanimously elected by a bench of six magistrates, there being no other candidate, in circumstances which show that the decision was not due to politics or religion, and I see no reason whatever why I should advise the Lord Lieutenant not to approve the appointment.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT—THE PARISH OF ASH.—QUESTION.

MR. A. H. BROWN asked the President of the Local Government Board, Why the authorities of Eassey Union have failed to take any steps for the proper drainage of the parish of Ash, in accordance with the directions of the Local Government Board; and, inasmuch as the village and neighbourhood have been visited by periodical outbreaks of fever and diphtheria in recent years, what steps the Board intend to take to ensure improved regulations and arrangements for that locality?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, the drainage of Ash had been the subject of a long correspondence between the rural sanitary authority at Eassey and the Local Government Board. A complaint having been made under the Public Health Act, a formal inquiry was held as to the condition of things. The local authorities were afterwards instructed to take steps to carry into effect the recommendations made in the Report. In the last few days, he had been informed that the rural sanitary authorities had arrived at the conclusion that no drainage was required at Ash. He had not yet decided what course to adopt, as the case presented certain difficulties.

ARMY—PAY OF BREVET MAJORS.
QUESTION.

CAPTAIN O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, If he would explain why Brevet Majors of Cavalry do not get the 2s. a-day extra pay given to Brevet Majors of Infantry?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the Cavalry officers received 14s. 7d. a-day, while the Infantry officers received only 11s. 7d. That would account for the difference in the extra pay.

CRIMINAL LAW—IMPORTATION OF ITALIAN CHILDREN.

QUESTION.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has had the opportunity of considering the present state of the Law as regards the introduction into this country of Italian children, who have been taken away from Italy in violation of the Laws of that Kingdom; and, whether he is prepared to take any steps to suppress this traffic?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he was aware that the the Italian Government were anxious as to the matter referred to in the Question. He had been in communication with the Foreign Office and the Education Department on the subject, and he had also received a communication from the Charity Organization Society, with a notification that, in their opinion, there existed at the present moment ample means of meeting the question under the existing law. He intended to have a conference with the Society during the present week, when they would lay the whole case before him.

ARMY VETERINARY DEPARTMENT— CANDIDATES.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN MILNE HOME asked the Secretary of State for War, If he is aware that, though nearly one hundred fresh men have entered the veterinary profession during the last three months, no candidates have offered themselves for the fifteen vacancies now existing in the Army Veterinary Department; and, if he will state what immediate measures he proposes to take, in order to make this branch of the service more popular in the veterinary profession?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that no candidates had offered themselves for the 15 vacancies now existing in the Army Veterinary department. Many schemes had been submitted to the War Department for the purpose of making that branch of the Service more popular with the Veterinary Profession, and were now under consideration; but until the probable cost and the result of such schemes had been inquired into he had not thought it right to make any proposal on the subject.

EGYPT—THE LATE FINANCE MINISTER.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has any information regarding the fate of the late Monfettish of Egypt?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that the Foreign Office received some time ago a despatch from Mr. Vivian, stating that the late Monfettish, or Finance Minister, of Egypt, was condemned last September to be exiled to a place in Upper Egypt. He was conveyed along the River Nile to the Second Cataract, where he was disembarked, and the rest of the journey was performed by land. It appeared that during the journey from the Second Cataract his constitution became more and more enfeebled by dysentery, and Her Majesty's Government, unfortunately, were told that his death took place shortly after his arrival at the place of his exile, it having been occasioned by congestion of the brain, and accelerated by intemperance.

CIVIL SERVICE COMPETITION.

QUESTION.

DR. BRADY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If his attention has been directed to the working of the 7th Article of the General Regulations, issued on the 4th of June 1870, with regard to open competition for the Civil Service; and if the prohibition therein imposed on successful candidates has been found conducive to the public interest?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, although he must premise that it was most inexpedient that changes should be rashly made in the regulations respecting admission to the Civil Service, yet he was prepared to admit that the question was one which deserved some consideration. The General Regulations had been under consideration for some time, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had thought it right to ask the Civil Service Commissioners to report to him upon the effect of the article referred to, as regarded the securing of the best men for the Public Service.

MINES ACT, 1872—CONVICTION OF MR. B. THOMAS.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to the report in the "Western Mail" of the 21st inst. of the trial and conviction of Benjamin Thomas, Manager of the Weigfach Colliery, near Swansea for a breach of "The Mines Act, 1872;"

whether, considering that no less than eighteen persons lost their lives through the offence, he will deal with the case under the thirty-second Clause of "The Mines Act, 1872:" if he has considered the small amount of the fine, £20, imposed by the Statute in such cases: and, if he will this Session bring in a measure that will substantially deal with cases of this kind.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that his attention had been directed to the case in question, but the Inspector had not yet sent in his final Report, because certain legal proceedings before the magistrates were not yet concluded. When these proceedings were terminated, the Report would be placed in his hands, and he should then be able to determine whether he would deal with the case under the 32nd clause of the Act. The amount of the fine (£20) imposed by the statute in such cases might be small; but it should be borne in mind that persons guilty of negligence might be indicted for manslaughter or misdemeanour. With regard to the 32nd section of the Mines Regulation Act, he was afraid the managers of mines had been in the habit of looking at it somewhat as a dead letter, and he had therefore twice during the present year ordered an investigation into the conduct of the manager of a mine under that section, for the purpose of showing managers that it was not a dead letter, and that if they broke it they would be liable to be punished with the loss of their certificates.

INDIA—THE SALT DUTIES.

QUESTION.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If his attention has been called to the speech of Sir John Strachey in the Legislative Council of India on the Salt Duties; and, whether the Indian Government will be able, without any loss of revenue, to equalize or reduce the duties on salt so as to admit English salt into the Madras Presidency on the same terms as it had been introduced into Calcutta?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, Sir John Strachey's argument was to the effect that, in dealing with the salt duties, we ought to endeavour to give to India a supply of salt at the cheapest rate consistent with financial necessities. He also analyzed at some length the different systems under which salt was taxed in the different parts of India, and the various sources of supply. In Bengal, where Native manufacture of salt was not easy, the salt consumed was almost exclusively English, upon which an import duty was levied of 3r. 4a. per maund. On the other hand, in Madras and Bombay, the manufacture of salt from the sea by Native agency is cheap and easy, and a duty is levied of 1r. 13a. per maund. Unless English salt can compete in cheapness with the salt manufactured in Madras, no reduction or alteration in the duties will secure its use in that Presidency. The Secretary of State has recently directed an inquiry into the whole question of salt duties, and more especially with regard to the Madras system.

PLUMSTEAD COMMON — LEGAL PROCEEDINGS.—QUESTION.

MR. BOORD asked the Secretary of State for the War Department, Whether the recent arrest of two persons named Cowing and Deadman, at the suit of the War Department (or the Crown), decided by the judgment of the Court of Exchequer to have been effected on illegal process, was sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government; and, if so, whether he is prepared to make adequate compensation to the persons arrested in respect of their illegal imprisonment?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the matter was one in which no directions were given by the Treasury or by any other Department of the Government. What had been done occurred in the ordinary course of business. He understood that the case was something of this kind—An action was brought against his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, or against the Crown, by certain persons in regard to the use of Plumstead Common. The action was tried, and the Court decided in favour of the Crown, leaving the plaintiffs to pay the costs. When the costs were applied for, the plaintiffs either had no property, or had conveyed away what property they had. In these circumstances the Solicitor to the Treasury, pursuing what he considered to be the usual course, took steps for the arrest of these persons. He was not informed of this till some days afterwards, but on hearing of it, and in consultation with his right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for War and the Secretary of State for the Home Department, orders were given for the discharge of these persons. Subsequently, he believed, a plea was made in their behalf in the Court of Exchequer, and, as the Government made no appearance in the case beyond stating that they had been discharged, a decision was given in their favour. He had called on the Solicitor to the Treasury to make a full Report on the subject, and when it was received he should be better able to judge of the proper course to be pursued.

THE FIJI ISLANDS—LABOUR TRAFFIC. QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any regulations have been adopted to control the labour traffic between the Islands of the Pacific and the Colony of Fiji, as well as the internal traffic in natives of Fiji between the various Islands of the Fiji group; if so, whether he would lay upon the Table Copies of such regulations; and, whether the proposed change of the seat of Government of the Colony of Fiji from Levuka to Suva has as yet been carried out?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, an Ordinance regulating the labour traffic in the islands of the Pacific has been recently approved by the Secretary of State, and two others are now under consideration. There will be no objection to lay any or all of these Ordinances upon the Table when complete; but it will be desirable to defer doing so until they assume their final shape. As regards the change of capital, it was notified to the Governor of Fiji by telegraph on the 26th of March that Her Majesty had selected Suva as the future capital of the Colony. It is, therefore, probable that steps will by this time have been taken to carry out that decision.

ARMY PROMOTION AND RETIREMENT —THE WARRANT.—QUESTION.

COLONEL MURE said, he wished to give Notice that on Thursday next he would ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, many months ago, the draft Warrant for Army Promotion and Retirement has not been submitted to the Treasury; whether there had not been great delay in bringing it before the House of Commons; and, whether there was any probability of its being laid upon the Table at an early date?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I think I can answer the Question generally at once. It is true that the draft Warrant was sent in to the Treasury some considerable time ago, and that it has been under the careful consideration of the Treasury; but it is a matter that involves a good deal of expense, not so much at the present moment perhaps as in future years, and, therefore, it is the duty of the Treasury very carefully to examine the proposals, but we have been examining them without any unnecessary delay, and we hope before very long to come to an agreement with my right hon. Friend, and in time for the Warrant to be laid before Parliament before the close of the Session.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

—:O:—

ARMY—MOUNTED RIFLEMEN.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. CARPENTER-GARNIER rose to call attention to the subject of Mounted Riflemen in general, and to the system of drill and tactics carried out by Lieutenant Colonel Bower in the Hampshire Mounted Rifle Volunteers in particular. The system was one which ought to be more generally adopted as an active method of warfare. For the importance of such troops, he would quote the statement of Colonel Hamley—that their functions were very numerous and various, and great attention had been paid to their use during the American War; and the author of the Recent Changes in the Art of War had described the value of mounted infantry such as the original dragoons. The corps to which he desired to call the attention of the House had been formed in 1859 or 1860, with the idea of utilizing the capabilities of good "cross-country" riders, and it consisted at first of 40 or 50 men. Colonel Bower had thought that the system he had known in India might be serviceable in this country, and he had introduced a new method of carrying the long rifle on horseback, and a new system of skirmishing which was peculiarly appropriate. The objects and use of the corps had been fully explained in a published letter which many hon. Members, probably, had seen, and, in particular, the advantages of the Martini-Henry over the short carbine had been described in it. The peculiarity of the Force was his excuse for occupying the time of the House. The corps, although established on such a small scale, was, in fact, a model in miniature which would probably be copied by other regiments, as it had been warmly praised by military critics. It was well adapted for skirmishing and celerity of manoeuvre, and its riding and shooting contests had been the origin of the very popular prize at Wimbledon, known as the "Loyd-Lindsay Prize." Having cited the authority of the late Sir Hope Grant, the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute), and others, as to the utility of such a force, the hon. Gentleman proceeded to contend that Cavalry, if armed with long-range rifles, might not only be able to act efficiently as skirmishers, but might even turn the tables on Infantry, because they would have the advantage over Infantry of the choice of position and cover. The history of Colonel Bower's drill-book was very curious. In 1869 it was sent to the War Office, where it was twice lost; and at length, in 1875, Colonel Bower was politely informed that the Secretary of State did not think it necessary to bring the book out at the public expense. Meantime, it could not but be flattering to his gallant friend, Colonel Bower, to find that a considerable portion of the system which he invented had been adopted by the regular Cavalry, and that circumstance alone should have saved him from the rebuff he had received at the hands of the War Office. It certainly was not Colonel Bower's wish to again take the command of the corps to which he belonged; for he had merely yielded to the request of the men whom he commanded when he withdrew his resignation and asked to be reinstated in his position. There were only two such mounted corps in England and two in Scotland, and he ventured to ask the Secretary of State for War, whether he agreed in the proposition that a mounted rifle Force was valuable at the present day; and, if so, whether he intended to take any steps for providing such a Force for the defence of the country, whether in connection with the Regular Army or otherwise?

GENERAL SHUTE said, that the corps referred to was a special, and, he might say, a model corps. He did not think we had anything to learn from America. The reason they employed mounted rifles in the American War was because they had no Cavalry and could not form any. But he quite agreed with his hon. Friend as to the value of hunting men for such a corps. There could be no good outpost officer who was not also a good man across country, because in England our strict law of trespass prevented Cavalry officers acquiring the necessary eye to country, except in the hunting field. The idea of Colonel Bower was, that in every county of England we had a number of gentlemen who could cross country, who were good shots, and who might be utilized with great advantage. With regard to Colonel Bower's corps, he thought it was of the greatest possible moment to utilize all classes of our population for military purposes. In the Yeomanry, there were men who would not be procured for military service, excepting in such a Force; and in Colonel Bower's corps there were good sportsmen and good men to hounds, all mounted on horses far superior to anything you could get elsewhere, who would not join the Yeomanry. There were many occasions on which such a Force would be extremely valuable, and at the recent Manœuvres Colonel Bower had rendered him (General Shute) excellent service. He must say he was rather disappointed at the reason which his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War gave the other evening for not employing Colonel Bower in consequence of his age, which was 67. He thought age was one of the very worst tests. Some men were older at 35 than others at 65. Colonel Bower's chief complaint, as stated in an official letter, a copy of which he now held in his hand, was that officers had frequently been sent to inspect him who could not follow him and his corps across the country. He thought when they got rid of an officer because he was 67 years of age, they ought certainly to get rid of those who could not follow him, or his corps across the country. He hoped his right hon. Friend would think the matter over again, for Colonel Bower's services had been most valuable. He did not mean to say that the system would ever be the least valuable as regarded the regular Cavalry, but it would be most valuable as regarded small corps, as one such might in emergency be raised in each one of our hunting counties composed of the sons of noblemen, and country gentlemen on their own good hunters.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK considered that here, as in many other matters, the Volunteer Force were far ahead of the military authorities. He regretted that it too often happened that the claims of men like Colonel Bower were overlooked through jealousy and other unworthy motives. He supposed there had been some technical reason which prevented Colonel Bower being continued in command; but this he must say, that his services had been most valuable to the Volunteers of the country. If ever there was a case which called for exceptional treatment, this was one, and he therefore trusted his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War would so regard it. The Force had been in existence since 1859, and had been framed after a model which had been originated during the Indian Mutiny. Great advantage would be derived from arming the Cavalry with long-range rifles, instead of rifled carbines. The Americans during the Civil War had discovered that Cavalry unarmed with long-range rifles were liable to be driven out of the field before Infantry, and General Sherman had adopted the manoeuvre with remarkable results. In Russia the principle had also been recognized and introduced, and the advantage of it had been already felt during the present war on the Danube. The capture of the bridge at Ibraila was entirely due to the use of a force of Cossacks armed with long-range rifles. Our military authorities had partly adopted the principle, but they had left out the most essential part of it. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would carefully look into the case.

ARMY—MILITIA SURGEONS—ROYAL WARRANT, 1870.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR, in rising to draw attention to the position of the Militia Surgeons under the Royal Warrant and Instructions of July 1870, said: Sir, in drawing the attention of the House to the results of recent Army reforms on the Militia surgeons, a few remarks will be sufficient. Formerly they held their position under various Acts which regulated their duties, allowances, and pensions. Their mere regimental pay during training was the least part of their remuneration. They had to inspect recruits both for the Line and Militia, they attended on the Staff, and examined the pensioners both for the Army and Admiralty. Of course, it was only in certain localities that Militia surgeons had all these additional duties imposed upon them, and their pay varied according to the extent of their public duties. Among the Militia surgeons were a few earning £300 a-year; there were 12 earning between £250 and £300; 50 earned between £200 and £250; and most of the remainder received annual sums from £100 to £200. When the new military reform, which established Depot Centres, came into operation, many of the duties performed by Militia surgeons were transferred to Army surgeons. The effect of these changes was, however, to be partly compensated by the improved pay. The pay during training had been gradually raised to 17s. 6d. a-day, and by the new Warrant it was made £1 a-day. During the period of 27 days' training, the pay was thus augmented by £3 7s. 6d. a-year; but the loss of pay, owing to the transference of duties, was from £200 to £250 a-year. It is not an arithmetical puzzle to see that a gain of, say, £4 a-year is no compensation for a loss of £200 a-year. The Militia surgeons had their duties taken away from them, not at their own desire, though it may have been, and probably was, for the benefit of the Public Service that this change should be made. But it is a common rule of equity that if private interests are to be sacrificed for public good, compensation should be given. It was deemed expedient to get rid of Militia adjutants; but those who resigned were pensioned. In the Civil Service it is the same. We do not reduce even clerkships in a Department without some compensation to the holder. This was so obviously just, that Lord Cardwell promised in April and June of 1872 full consideration for instances of individual hardship; and on the 6th July, 1874, and on the 2nd June, 1875, the present Secretary of State for War (Mr. Hardy) again promised to consider each case according to its merits. This was a just promise. Some of the regiments are not affected by the new Regulations from not being near a Brigade Depot; and when they are, the cases of hardships vary so much that they could not be dealt with en bloc, and therefore individual examination was right and proper. The Militia surgeons, relying on those promises, have sent in their cases to the War Office; but every one has been refused any redress or compensation. At a deputation to the Secretary of State for War, on the 23rd April, he absolutely refused consideration to the Militia surgeons' case; first, because he had no power to deal with it; and second, because they asked pay for duties which they were not performing. But it was not their fault that they were not performing these duties. They were both able and willing to do so. Now, their grievance lies in this—the Militia surgeons could not combine their military duties with an efficient attention to practice. They were liable under the old Acts to serve where their regiments were embodied, and they were embodied both in the Crimean War and Indian Mutiny. Under their old rules they might and were frequently absent from private practice; but they were fairly paid for their public duties and were satisfied to perform them. But now the case is entirely different. Instead of emoluments of from £200 to £300 a-year, you ask them to act for 27 days at £1 a-day. This amount would scarcely suffice to pay an assistant while they were engaged in military duty. To old men who have sacrificed private practice for Militia duty, it is absolute ruin to be suddenly deprived of their former duties and emoluments without compensation. The State cannot have contemplated this when it made the changes. I presume and admit that the changes are right, but I ask that, as in all similar cases, public interests should not be procured by the sacrifice of private interests, but that these should receive a fair compensation for the injury inflicted.

EARL PERCY rejoiced that the subject had been brought before the House, and expressed a hope that, if necessary, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lyon Playfair) would press the question to a division. He was certain that the Militia surgeons had lost by the changes which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had introduced, by which the responsibility of passing recruits and other duties had been taken from them. He was also certain that it had been a detriment to the Force to appoint a man a Militia surgeon only during the time when the regiment was in training. He should support the appeal that had been made for compensation to this class of deserving officers.

COLONEL MURE thought it most important that all recruits, whether for the Militia or the Army, should be examined by surgeons of the Regular Army; for no man with civilian practice had had sufficient experience in passing men for either Service, but that he might be deceived. The Militia surgeons were very excellent men; but, in very many cases, they wanted the experience of the surgeons of the Regular Army. With regard to recruiting that was essentially necessary. The Regular Army surgeon was the man best suited to pass men into the Army.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he would not attempt to discuss the expediency of the changes which had been made; but the question brought forward by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Lyon Playfair) was, whether, in carrying out the present scheme, they were not dealing harshly with Militia surgeons who had entered the Service prior to those changes. In his opinion they were dealing harshly, for the old Militia surgeons could not fall back on any private practice. The question for the House was whether, after a certain amount of service, a Militia surgeon could obtain some compensation, and whether it was to be given by the State or by an exceptional grant in each case; his own feeling was in favour of the latter suggestion. At all events, this was a subject which fairly deserved consideration.

MR. CHILDERS said, that it was hardly fair for the House to discuss then the Regulation made in 1873. He believed it would be very desirable to revert to the former system of the examination of recruits for the Militia by Militia surgeons, especially in agricultural districts. He trusted that in future every case would be dealt with on its own merits; for in the case of old Militia surgeons there were undoubtedly great hardships, while with the younger Militia surgeons there was no hardship at all. Treated in that way a very moderate sum of money would be required to give satisfaction to these gentlemen. Some of the older men had been deprived of three-fourths of their pay, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hardy) would comply with the request of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Lyon Playfair).

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY said, this was a simple question of justice. A new system had been inaugurated, in effecting which he considered that the claims of these Militia surgeons, many of whom had been long in the Service, had not been justly or equitably considered. The House of Commons ought not to be satisfied with anything less than a promise from the Secretary of State for War that he would endeavour to obtain from the Treasury proper compensation for those officers. Should he do so, no doubt he would succeed. Compensation was always given in cases of interference with legal officers, and there was no reason why it should not be given in this case.

ARMY—MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

OBSERVATIONS.

Dr. LUSH rose to call attention to the condition of the Medical Department of the Army, many of whose members, he urged, were dissatisfied with the present Regulations. A few years ago the same complaint arose from the Medical department of the Sister Service, where there was a chronic state of discontent. But the Naval authorities put their shoulders to the wheel, and now they never heard one word of open discontent amongst the Naval surgeons. Under our new system of military tactics, it was necessary to move large bodies of troops with celerity, and it was only by the skilled and anxious supervision of the Army Medical department that they could be kept in fighting health, whether on rapid marches, or in the trenches. The number of officers in that department had been gradually diminishing since the year 1869. In 1871-2, when the effective strength of the Army was 132,000, there were 613 medical officers. In 1877-8, when the numerical strength of the British Army was 131,000 of all ranks, the number of medical officers had fallen to 531. In 1868-9, in the whole of the British Army, there were 43 administrative and 1,039 executive medical officers. In 1877 the administrative medical officers were 42 and the executive 870. That he regarded as very unsatisfactory. If the British Army was to be maintained in efficiency, the Medical department ought not to bear such a reduction as that which had taken place. The regulations with respect to the Veterinary department were also, he understood, in an unsatisfactory state. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hardy) had expressed his surprise that at a time when a number of medical appointments were to be given away, comparatively few candidates applied for them, and said it seemed to him to be discouraging. The clear inference from that was that the right hon. Gentleman had not made the inducements sufficiently attractive for medical men to enter the Services. It might be said that the grievances complained of were not of a serious character, but some of them were of a serious character, and they all tended to render the Service generally less popular than it might otherwise be. The right hon. Gentleman issued a Circular last year in which he did endeavour somewhat to remedy the evils complained of with respect to promotion and retirement, by paying off those gentlemen who were not efficient, thus retaining the best men in the Service; and if the effort had proved successful, some of the complaints might have been removed; but it appeared that it had not been successful, being only a limited and partial remedy, and that the complaints of those who were in the Service were such as to deter men from entering it. In Ireland the examining and teaching authorities had in consequence expressly discouraged their pupils from entering the Army Medical Service. Now, that was a very serious thing. It might be said also that the grievances in question were of a sentimental rather than of a practical nature; but even so far as they might be called sentimental, they were not of a character to be overlooked, and some of them were really practical grievances. One thing of which they complained was the shifting and arbitrary character of their appointments, which placed them in a much less favourable position in many respects as compared with combatant officers of the Army. They were frequently shifted from one regiment to another, had to purchase horses for short service, and suffered losses for which they received no compensation. Another ground of complaint had reference to the matter of leave. They were not in the same favourable position with respect to leave as the combatant officers, who, under the Regulations, could obtain 61 days' leave of absence unconditionally, whereas medical officers had to pay for substitutes during their absence. They were at a great disadvantage also with regard to position when compared with the combatant officers, the medical officer becoming junior in the rank to which he belonged. These things tended to produce an uncomfortable feeling among the medical officers in the Army. Then there was a more important matter with regard to the right of exchange. The War Office, it had been said, proceeded in that matter upon the principle of dealing with each case on its merits as it arose, but the system did not appear to work well. One disadvantage in regard to exchanges was that whereas the combatant officer after three years' residence in England on leave from India was readily granted an exchange on applying for it, the medical officer's application was refused, and after his three years in England he was sent back to India peremptorily. That was a matter which affected the Army medical officers seriously; and there was nothing in their position which appeared to justify such a distinction, as compared with the case of the combatant officers. Another complaint on the part of the medical officer was that, by the rules of the Service, whatever outfit he might have, he was compelled, when attached to any branch of the Service, to purchase at his own expense a case of instruments he did not want. That was not, perhaps, a great grievance in itself, but it added one more straw to the weight which pressed on the medical officers of the Army. Instances could easily be cited to show that there was a good deal of oppressive injustice in the way in which they were dealt with, and a good deal of indifference as to their claims which ought not to exist. With regard to one of their grounds of complaint, the case might be mentioned of a surgeon-major who entered 28 years ago into the old Ordnance department, who was a man of eminent ability and might have risen to some important position in his own department, but who, although he had served in the Crimea and elsewhere abroad, was excluded from promotion by the arbitrary rule which prevented a man joining the Ordnance department rising above the rank of surgeon-major, unless he had served for a certain time in India. The same feeling of injustice existed among the Army medical officers in India as prevailed amongst those at home; and the effect generally of the administration of the War Office with respect to that Service was prejudicial and injurious. There was a feeling amongst the officers of that Service that their claims did not meet with the recognition and attention which they had a right to assume was due to them. If that was the opinion of the House, he trusted they would support him on behalf of those men who were members of an honourable Profession, and who were always ready to do their duty, even in spite of this systematic withholding and invasion of their rights by the War Office. The importance of the Medical Staff of the Army was such that no statesman or patriot could wisely overlook their claims. There might be occasions when the want of a thorough Medical Staff would convert what might otherwise be success into irremediable disaster. Another matter of which these officers had reason to complain was the niggardly way in which honours, such as were conferred on combatant men for distinguished services, were distributed to them. And in that, as in other matters, he trusted that their claims would receive proper recognition.

COLONEL NORTH regretted that there was now great difficulty in obtaining candidates for the vacancies in the Army Medical department, which young medical men were solicited to enter. In the last Army Appropriation Account some observations were made by the Auditor General which showed the present condition of our Army Medical department. They first showed that the number of medical officers was below the efficient strength; and next, that owing to the falling off in the number of those officers, the employment of private medical practitioners became necessary. The Returns on the Table of the House too stated that, though the number of the Army had been increased, the number of medical officers had from time to time been reduced. They were now almost on the brink of war. It was impossible to know whether we might not be sending troops abroad in the course of a very few weeks, and he asked was that a time to have the medical Staff below its full strength? Surely, it was not. He moved for Returns, and he found that the whole medical system of the Army had been changed. It was of the greatest consequence to the men that they should have their regimental medical officers, who were known to them, and in whom they had confidence, to attend to them. In private life men did not change their medical men, whom they knew, and in whom they had confidence every week, and yet instead of having medical officers attached to regiments as of old, they were subject to be changed under the new system. Only the other day he heard of a medical officer being attached to a regiment for a particular march. He had read, too, in a newspaper of a medical officer being placed in charge of a regiment for the voyage to the Cape, where he handed over his charge and returned home. He thought it a serious thing that medical officers going out on these responsible duties in charge of troops, perhaps, with serious cases under treatment—cases in which they might feel deep interest—should, on arrival at their destination, find that their duties ceased, and that they would have to transfer their patients to other medical men. A case had come to his knowledge of an officer in Ireland having been attended in an illness by five different medical officers, and at last employing a civil medical man. In his day no men used to be more welcomed than the medical officers of a regiment. They were the private friends of many of the officers, and the friend of every man in the regiment, and were always treated with respect and attention. At present, however, there were no medical officers who did not find fault with the present treatment of that department by the War Office. He had heard a remark made in 1856, that "the reputation of the Army was at stake, and in any change they ought to have what would command the assent of the great body of the Profession." Now this had not the assent of the great body of the Profession, and they must all feel that the Medical Service was one which ought to be in the best possible condition of order.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, it would almost seem from the speeches which had been made, that previous to the time when the recent changes had been made in the Medical department, there had been no grievances, and that there had been no demand for changes. His Predecessors, however, could have told a very different story. So far from that being the case, from the year 1858, when the Warrant was issued, on which they relied, medical officers continually asked more and more, until in 1873 another Warrant was issued. They came to him in 1874 and presented their grievances, every one of which had been met, and yet that evening the hon. Member for Salisbury (Dr. Lush) had put forth new grievances, some of which seemed to him to be wholly unworthy of a great Profession. His (Mr. Gathorne Hardy's) great desire had been to put the Medical department of the Army on a footing satisfactory to themselves; but in this, as in every other Service, there always would be discontents. The agitation in this case might be traced to one or two individuals. There had been a surgeon-major or surgeon in London who had, he believed, spent his whole time in dissuading young men from joining the Service. He trusted, however, that the Medical department would hold its own, and that these complaints would pass away. Allusion had been made to the system of three years' service in India. That was rendered necessary by the exigencies of climate, and the Indian Government would not take any one for an administrative Department who had not served three years there. If an officer had not complied with this rule, he had brought this bar upon himself, and was sent out to fill up the number of months or years which made up his term. It was, no doubt, a War Office rule; but it was rendered necessary by the rule of the Indian Government. His hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel

North) had gone back to the regimental system; but it had practically passed away by the Warrant of 1873, which was before his (Mr. Hardy's) period of office. With regard to the unification system, the hon. Member for Salisbury did not take exception to it, when it was brought forward, but the reverse, and the higher classes of the Department were uniformly in favour of that system. In time of war, the War Office was driven into the unification system. It could not be resisted, because you could not get on with regimental hospitals, and were obliged to have general hospitals. Having that day consulted the Director General of the Army Medical department, he had been assured that we had never gone to war with a medical system organized upon so good a footing as that which now existed, and that it could be put into the field and brought into operation at a moment's notice. If the Director General were deceiving him (Mr. Hardy) on that point, upon him or those who instructed him the blame must rest. He was steadily working to this end—that when the medical system was put in action in the field, it should be able to do the work and answer the purpose for which it was designed, so that all might fall into their places in time of war. With regard to the orderlies, they had been substituted for medical men at the instance of the medical officers themselves. The latter said they were not meant to take charge of certain matters belonging to the hospitals, and it was to relieve them of these medical duties that the medical orderlies had been introduced. He quite admitted that there had not been so large a number of applications to enter the medical Service as could have been desired; but there was not that number of vacancies which might have been supposed. In 1877-8 the department nominally consisted of 885 medical officers; its actual effective strength was 842, so that there were only 43 vacancies. There were, however, 17 candidates at Netley almost ready to join, which reduced the number of vacancies to 26. For these vacancies there would be an examination in August. There had been 80 applications for the Schedule of Instructions, and these persons might enter for competition when the time came. The hon. Member for Salisbury had used some language hardly, he thought, as he had spoken of the "sion of the rights of the War Office." O as to medical honours, he believed that these were obtained a larger number of honours than they were to? The reason why no more honours were absorbed them already, the department was advised to question by medical officers. The Medical Profession in the War Office was crushed it was under the Medical department. The hon. Member for Salisbury gentleman had the impression that the Medical Profession at home were men who had succeeded in the department had been better than to give it a high position, and, therefore, while increased pay and rank were said nothing about pay of that, but the hon. Member said they had received no promotion. But they had the opportunity of pressing those who had been at the front. The assistant surgeon with increased pay of 12 years' standing was a surgeon-major with no compensation, except a lump sum paid down of these officers? The hon. Member said compensation when they were promoted to a higher position to which they were entitled after a long service. The War Office was to encourage a system, and if a medical officer received forage, but it was a wrong system to be directly by means of a salary were to be paid, let it be directly, and not by a forage. As to let that arrangements could be made for granting medical officers the same way as other officers. It was an enormous addition to the list. They could not suppose they could those of other officers. He had done his best to get more officers for medical officers, and the great number had been pressed up the demand now made for instruments was altogether new. There was now a strict roster by which men took their share of foreign service; and though he should be glad to meet the demand for exchanges if he could, he did not see how it was possible under the unification system. Was it fair that the new system, in the first year of its operation, should be charged with all the difficulties attributed to it? If it were allowed a fair trial, the heads of the departments believed that it would work well, and they said they were prepared to go into the field with it, in firm reliance that it would answer the purposes for which it was designed. With respect to the complaint of the Militia surgeons, they had formerly their pay and certain payments for work done—he might call it piece-work. They were paid for examination of recruits, had allowances for attendance on the permanent Staff and their families, and for the preliminary training. Complaints had been made, however, that attendance on the permanent Staff and at preliminary drill was unremunerative; and, as to the recruits they had examined, the interval between examination and preliminary drill was sometimes so long that when they came up they were found to be unfit for the Service. It was difficult to find fault with those who examined them, for the recruits might have been in a fit condition at the time they were examined; but still the facts led to the inference, that there was on the part of the Militia surgeons less ability to examine properly than was possessed by Army surgeons with greater practice. There was a particular mode of payment under which it did not answer a man's purpose to get more than five recruits in a day, and such anomalies occurred as 68 recruits being brought in at a charge of £166, while 77 were obtained for £7. Under all the circumstances it was thought best to commit the work to Army surgeons. If he were to make application to the Treasury, he did not see on what principle he could propose to give compensation for taking away the work which had been done as piece-work, especially as the ordinary pay and allowances of Militia surgeons had been largely increased, the ordinary pay being now £1 6s. 6d., whereas it was formerly 14s. 4d. a-day. He thought they had done very well. He would admit they had satisfactorily performed their duties; but when it was said they were taken away from private practice, it must be remembered that a Militia appointment was often an introduction to private practice. He had now to deal with the subject of the Hampshire Yeomanry. He had read some letters in which the system had been very much praised. The officers had spoken favourably of it; but with the greatest possible respect for Colonel Power, who had done admirable work in his time, he could not think it right to make the sacrifice required for the purpose of retaining the services of that officer at the age of 67, and maintaining the Hampshire Mounted Rifles, which had never numbered more than 24 efficient, and were now reduced to 20. He did not think he should be called upon to set up a regiment which had failed, and he must decline to do so. It did not seem to him desirable to have two kinds of Cavalry drill going on at the same time, and he was not prepared to give up that which he thought the better for the worse. He hoped the House would now go into Committee and allow him to take the remaining Army Votes, after more than three and a-half nights of preliminary discussion.

CAPTAIN NOLAN reminded the right hon. Gentleman that the emoluments of Militia surgeons had been derived practically from the allowances which had been abolished. In fact, that abolition amounted to depriving them of a great part of their income. He knew one case in which the allowances amounted to £150 a-year, and it was unjust to take that away from him, while his regular salary was only increased by £40 or £50. As one of those, he might add, who had advocated the claims of the combatant officers to have permission to make exchanges, he thought that it was hard that any surgeon should not be allowed a similar privilege.

SUPERANNUATION ACT AMENDMENT ACT, 1873.—RESOLUTION.

MR. BOORD, in rising to move—

“That it is unjust that Departmental Circulars should be issued in such a form, or so interpreted as practically to repeal or modify the operation of an Act of Parliament; and that it is expedient that those persons who have been debarred from participation in the benefits of ‘The Superannuation Act Amendment Act,

1873,' by the War Office Circulars dated the 29th August and the 17th December 1861, and numbered 709 and 729 respectively, should be restored to the position they would have occupied had such circulars never been issued,"

said, he desired to call attention to the way in which certain persons had been treated in regard to Superannuation. His Motion consisted of two parts—the first dealt with the authority exercised by the War Department through the medium of Circulars; the second, with a specific grievance. In order to save the time of the House he would take the latter first, and he trusted the statement he was about to make would be found to justify the course he had thought it necessary to pursue. The Superannuation Act Amendment Act was passed on the 26th May, 1873, to remedy the inadvertence of the heads of certain Departments, in admitting persons into the Civil Service of the State (between the passing of the Superannuation Act, 1859, and the 4th June, 1870), without a certificate from the Civil Service Commissioners, as required by the Superannuation Act, 1859, such omission being without default on the part of the persons admitted. The Treasury was empowered to re-instate such persons in the position they would have occupied, with respect to superannuation, if such an inadvertence had not occurred. Numerous applications were made and dealt with under this Act; but it afterwards appeared that, "owing to mistakes" on the part of certain officers, there were some names omitted from the lists sent in, and it was necessary to pass another Act in 1876 to provide for them. His case was, that there were still others who were entitled to the benefit of the Act of 1873. There were some 600 men employed in the manufacturing departments—chiefly at Woolwich—whose position was identical with that of the persons mentioned in the Preamble to the Act of 1873. They entered the Service between the dates named, in the full expectation of being entitled to superannuation, but, through no default on their part, without a certificate from the Civil Service Commissioners. They had applied at the proper time to be dealt with under the Act of 1873, and subsequently, on several occasions, but had been refused on three grounds: first, that they were in receipt of the full market rate of wages; secondly, that they had not passed the Civil Service examination; and thirdly, that they were excluded by the decision announced in two Circulars issued in August and December, 1861. Now, by an Act passed in 1834, provision was made for granting superannuation to those who submitted to a specific abatement from their wages; but in 1857, this system of abatements was abolished by Act of Parliament, and consequently rendered illegal, and in 1859 the Superannuation Act was passed to extend the system of superannuation to all classes of the Civil Service, and regulate it on a just and intelligible principle. Therefore, when it was proposed, as was the case in the Circulars he complained of, not to grant superannuation to those who were in receipt of the full market rate of wages, but only to those who submitted to an abatement, he contended that such a course was in direct violation of the Act of 1857, and contrary to the spirit of the Act of 1859. The second objection—that they had not passed the Civil Service examination—was untenable, for the Act of 1873 was specially passed to meet the case; and the third—the decision of the Circulars—was equally invalid, for they merely announced the intention of the Department to grant superannuation only to those who submitted to an abatement of wages—a point he had already dealt with. The second Circular defined the "full market rate of wages" to be that at which men were found to be willing to engage themselves; but that was absurd, because no alternative rate was ever offered to the men. He admitted that the case would be different, if the men on whose behalf he pleaded had entered the Service with a knowledge of the existence of these Circulars; but that was not the case, the first they heard of them was in 1870. They entered in the full expectation of being entitled to superannuation, as their predecessors were, and without the slightest knowledge that any question could arise on the point. He had no doubt his right hon. Friend would tell him that the Circulars had been published in the usual manner in the Department at the time of their issue; but he had made the most careful inquiries, and had failed to elicit from any one the slightest knowledge of such publication, and he maintained that the individual assurances of 600 men were entitled to respect as against the memory of a few officials as to what had occurred 17 years ago, especially as it had been already necessary to pass two Acts of Parliament to remedy their "inadvertence" and "mistakes." The publication of the Circulars was a matter of vital importance to the men, whilst it was of no moment to their officers. The expense could not be pleaded as a reason why justice should not be done; but, even if that were an element in the case, it would hardly deserve consideration, for he had been informed that only about 24 per cent of the men would remain long enough in the Service—or live long enough—to become entitled to superannuation, so that, at the most, it was probably only a question of £700 or £800 per annum for a few years. With regard to the first part of the Motion, he contended that he had shown, first, that the Circulars had practically had the effect of repealing the Act of 1857, which abolished abatements of wages; and, secondly, that they had been employed to modify the operation of the Act of 1873, so as to exclude a number of men who were clearly entitled to the benefits it was intended to confer. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is unjust that Departmental Circulars should be issued in such a form, or so interpreted as practically to repeal or modify the operation of an Act of Parliament; and that it is expedient that those persons who have been debarred from participation in the benefits of 'The Superannuation Act Amendment Act, 1873,' by the War Office Circulars dated the 29th August and the 17th December 1861, and numbered 709 and 729 respectively, should be restored to the position they would have occupied had such circulars never been issued,"—

—instead thereof.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, his hon. Friend must feel some satisfaction in observing that on this interesting occasion, his right hon. Colleague (Mr. Gladstone) was not in his place, and that the working men of Greenwich and Woolwich committed their interests solely to his care. If justice demanded the payment of this sum, he (Mr. Hardy) would be the last man in the House to oppose it; but he disputed the principle on which his hon. Friend based this claim from beginning to end. The hon. Member laid it down that because of a certain Act passed in 1873, the Department was not able to employ men without giving them superannuation allowances.

MR. BOORD said, that what he contended was, that it was not competent for the Department to make contracts contrary to the Act of 1857, by which abatements in wages, with a view to superannuation, were rendered illegal.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Just so; but the Act of Parliament did not prevent the Department from making contracts outside its provisions. The case was a short and clear one. In 1859 it was laid down that those workmen who had not Civil Service certificates should not have superannuation, and the Act of 1869 confirmed that. The first Army Circular said that no person should be entitled to superannuation who was receiving the full market value of his labour, and the second Circular defined that to be the ordinary rate of wages. In 1873 an Act was passed relating to the Post Office, where it was admitted that certain persons had been employed inadvertently without reference to this arrangement; but, in the War Office, there was no inadvertence at all. Some men were employed who, it was alleged, did not know of the Regulation; but they were paid the full market rate of wages, and, therefore, were not entitled to superannuation. He could not understand that they did not know what the Regulations were; at any rate, full notice was given, perfectly clear, and open to everybody, and, therefore, no injustice had been done to those men whose case had been brought before the House. That was, in a word, the answer to the Resolution, to which he was sure the House would not agree.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that the policy of the Office had been not to take workmen whom they were bound to superannuate after a certain term of service. It was thought better to employ men as necessity required. The Act which had been referred to was passed for the benefit of a particular class of men, and those only; that was fully known at the time, and the other men did not claim to be treated in the same way. The Army Circulars were issued giving full notice to all the men employed, and therefore he hoped that the House would not agree to undo what had been done.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that having, whilst serving in the War Office, carefully inquired into the remuneration given to the workmen employed in the manufactures of Woolwich Arsenal, he might be allowed to contend that the War Office had acted liberally in fixing the rates of wages of the workmen, and although he had been employed on a Committee in the several factories, yet he had not heard a complaint put forward on behalf of these men. The charge made in 1859, by which the workmen of these important factories were paid daily rates of wage equal to the market rates, without any claim to pension, might have been challenged at that date as an objectionable measure; but seeing that all men employed since 1859 had received the very wage of the market, it would not be fair to the country to restore to them the claim to pension which that very payment was intended to withdraw. No doubt some of the workmen, formerly receiving rates of wage fixed per hour, had by long service been advanced to positions which entitled them to fixed weekly or monthly rates of wage, and by good service and experience deserved such of the State, and he would suggest that some of the best of these men should be placed on the establishment for pensions; but it would be a dangerous thing to interfere with a system which had been in force for 17 years without complaint. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press the Amendment.

(1.) £27,500, Administration of Military Law.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that the state of our Military Law at this moment was a disgrace in a great degree to the administration of justice, and to the many Governments which had allowed it to remain in its present position, and was almost a discredit to our Representative institutions. As far back as 20 years ago, Mr. Denison, who was then in the Judge Advocate General's department, called the attention of the Under Secretary of State, the present Marquess of Ripon, to the subject, and suggested that he should be authorized to prepare a code. The Under Secretary brought the matter before Mr. Sidney Herbert, who was then Secretary of State for War, and Mr. Sidney Herbert wrote a Minute, dated July, 1859, in which he said he could not undertake to say that it would be possible to legislate on the subject next Session, but it must be done at an opportune time. Nothing was done at that time; but 10 years afterwards, in 1868, the Government of Lord Derby took the matter in hand, and issued a Royal Commission to inquire in what respects the administration of Military Law might be amended, particularly with reference to the constitution and practice of courts martial. That Royal Commission was one of great weight; it consisted of 11 Members, among whom were Colonel Wilson-Patten, now Lord Winmarleigh, Lord Eversley, Lord Hartington, two Gentlemen who had been Judge Advocates General, the Recorder, Mr. Vivian, and four general officers—General Peel, Sir Alfred Horsford, the late Lieutenant General Scarlett, and General Eyre, and it reported in 1869. Some of the recommendations of that Commission with respect to the punishment for drunkenness and other matters were adopted, not by statute, but by regulation; but, up to the present time, their material recommendations had remained a dead letter. The Commissioners, in their Report, said that the Military Law was in the most complicated state, and they quoted the evidence of Mr. Headlam, who had been Judge Advocate General, that the Mutiny Act was confused, and contained provisions, many of which were obsolete and many unnecessary. They also quoted the evidence of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mowbray), who had been twice Judge Advocate General, to the effect that the law was confused, uncertain, and conflicting; that it was perplexing to lawyers, and must be perplexing to military men. His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief also bore testimony to the evil arising from the frequent assembling of courts martial, and stated that, in his view, the law ought to be much more clear and more simple. Accordingly, the Commission reported that the simplification of Military Law ought to receive the immediate attention of Her Majesty's Government. From that time to the present no change had been made, and the recommendations of the Commissioners had fallen entirely to the ground. When he (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) held the office of Judge Advocate General, under the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), he drew the attention of the Government to this matter, and felt it to be his duty to prepare certain Bills to amend the law; but the great subjects of the disestablishment of the Irish Church, the Land Question, and Abolition of Purchase in the Army, which the Government then had in hand, prevented them dealing with the question of military reform. Since the present Government came into office, although unwilling to press them to take up the question before they had got thoroughly settled into their position, yet he had questioned them every Session whether they intended to deal with the subject. This Session the Judge Advocate General stated that he was most anxious, and intended to do so next Session. Now, he was most anxious to ascertain what were the views of the Government with regard to Military Law. What did they propose to do next Session? He thought the proper course would be this—At present it was necessary to pass the Mutiny Act in April. He would introduce only a temporary Mutiny Act for next year, and at the same time bring in a Bill relating to Military Law, which should be referred to a Select Committee. On what principle should the new military code be framed? Should the Mutiny Act and the Articles of War be retained, or should there be a permanent code regulating the discipline of the Army? He was entirely opposed to a permanent code. He thought the old system of the Mutiny Act and the Articles of War should be retained; but there were many points to be considered, and he would suggest that the Mutiny Act should define clearly who were the persons to be subjected to its discipline, what were the nature of the crimes to be subjected to punishment, and lastly, the manner in which that punishment should be administered. The Mutiny Act and the Articles of War contained a great deal that might be put in the Queen's Regulations, or in an Army Service Act, to be renewed every five years. The Mutiny Act, however, should be an annual Act. It was 180 years since the Mutiny Act was first introduced, and it had always remained an annual Act. It represented, as it were, the popular feeling in the House of Commons more than any other Act, and in that respect there was an advantage in its being an annual Act. The Mutiny Act should deal with the Army in time of peace; and, in time of war, the Queen should be authorized to issue a new code to deal with armies in the field. With reference to courts martial, the present system certainly worked well, considering the great objections which had been raised to parts of it. It generally did justice between the parties; at the same time, there was great complication in it, and the Royal Commission had reported in favour of its amendment. He was rather in favour of retaining the three kinds of courts martial—general, district, and regimental. The question, however, was a very serious one, as it appeared from a Return laid on the Table on Saturday that the number of courts martial held in the last three years amounted to no fewer than 40,273. One question which arose was as to the president of courts martial. He thought military Judge Advocates should be the permanent presidents. There were now only three district Judge Advocates, and he thought that number ought to be increased. Then, as regarded the taking of evidence, instead of having the questions put in writing, he would have viva voce examinations, and question and answer taken down by shorthand writers. The expense need not be great, as shorthand could be taught in the schools of each garrison. He would also retain, and, in some respects, enlarge the scope and powers of Courts of Inquiry. With respect to the power of re-assembling a court martial, it ought to be allowed in case a mistake had been committed, but never with a view to increase a sentence already pronounced—a thing which was repugnant to British law. The subject of the abolition of the office of Judge Advocate General had more than once been debated; but, speaking from experience, he was wholly opposed to such a step. The appointment to the office ought not to be permanent; but it ought to be represented by a Member of the Government in that House, and be held by a civilian, and not by a military man. One other question had been raised—namely, whether the Judge Advocate should have power to quash the finding of a court martial. For his part, he did not doubt that such power should exist. It was not the Judge Advocate who quashed the finding; it was Her Majesty, for he acted in Her Majesty's name. He did not wish to prevent his right hon. Friend taking Supply; but he thought the question was deserving of notice, and hoped that the matter might be taken in hand by the Government next Session, and be fully inquired into by a Select Committee.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON joined in the hope expressed by the right hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Clare, that the Government would next Session appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the matter, and thus let the Army know that both they and the House of Commons took an interest in what so nearly concerned them. He also trusted that a Bill on the subject would be brought forward next Session.

MR. WHALLEY wished that the right hon. Gentleman would give his attention to the subject, as he was of opinion that a standing Army was a mistake and a nuisance. What was required was a return to the old Militia system. They should do everything in their power to prevent the people from thinking that if a man entered the Army he abandoned all the rights and privileges of an Englishman. If they wished to make the Army really popular, that was the only way to do so.

MR. HAYTER said, he had always been surprised, and regretted the fact, that some of the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners had been treated with neglect by successive Governments. Their recommendation in regard to fines being instituted for drunkenness had, indeed, been adopted; and extremely good results to the Army at large had followed, for the number of trials for drunkenness had decreased from 3,900 in 1869 to 2,500 in 1875. He would ask his right hon. Friend the Member for Whitehaven to direct his attention particularly to two other recommendations made by the Commissioners, with a view to their adoption. One was to the effect that cases of embezzlement should be tried by the ordinary criminal Courts, and the other was that the power of commanding officers, so far as regarded imprisonment, should be enlarged from seven to 21 days. Many of the trivial offences for which men were now tried by regimental courts martial might then be disposed of by the commanding officers. The hon. Gentleman, in conclusion, pointed out a difference between Clause 10 of the Mutiny Act and one of the Articles of War, and expressed a hope that this discrepancy would be removed.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, the House ought to be thankful to the right hon. and learned Member for Clare for having brought that important question before it, and he trusted that the Government would take some action in the matter. He agreed that the Articles of War were in a confused and complicated state. He was glad the right hon. and learned Baronet agreed that courts martial as a rule possessed the confidence of the Army. Seeing how well they were spoken of, he should only be too glad to see their procedure in some points improved. They ought not to be re-assembled for the purpose of increasing sentences; and with regard to the suggested extension of the powers of the commanding officers, he could see no reason why, in simple cases, their power should not be increased up to 21 days' imprisonment, especially as there would still be an appeal to a court martial. It was absurd that hon. Members should have the power of revising the Mutiny Act every year in that House, while the Articles of War were entirely withdrawn from their consideration. He would suggest that both should be subject to the discussion of the House.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN thought so serious a task as his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Clare had undertaken ought not to be commenced at so late a period of the Session. Animadversions had been made on the circumstance that so many years had elapsed since the Report of the Royal Commission, and it was further said that the late Government had neglected their recommendations. But at that time his right hon. and learned Friend was himself in office, and bestowed considerable pains on the subject. His right hon. and learned Friend was succeeded by Mr. Davidson, one of the best lawyers who had of late years had a seat in that House, and who was engaged in the amendment of the Mutiny Act at the very moment of his death, the papers being in his hand when he was found dead in his bed. Indeed, the late Government had advanced so far in the preparation of a Military Code, that Mr. Ayrton was prepared to lay a Bill upon the subject on the Table upon the first day of the Session of 1874, but circumstances prevented that being done. There had been no culpable or wilful neglect in the matter; but the question was one of such great difficulty, delicacy, and importance, that it was easy to say that it ought to be dealt with, but not so easy to do it. He thought it would be better that the Government should not take the course which had been suggested to them this Session—namely, that of appointing a Committee of that House to investigate the subject, and lay down the principles on which they ought to go; but that the Government themselves, during the Recess, acting on the advice of those best qualified to assist them, should arrange, either by a Bill, or in some other form, the principles on which they thought legislation should proceed, and then that their proposal should be introduced at the beginning of next Session, and, if necessary, referred to a Select Committee. The question being of great delicacy in a constitutional point of view—both as affecting the rights of the people on the one side, and the Prerogative of the Crown on the other—was precisely one of those subjects which it was least desirable to throw on the Table of a Select Committee, and invite them to suggest what ought to be done. It ought to be dealt with by the responsible Government of the day. But in any case, he hoped that action would be taken in the matter. The Mutiny Act, the Articles of War, and the Queen's Regulations were so contradictory and conflicting that it was really necessary to do something to make them more intelligible, as well as to introduce many of the changes which had been alluded to in that discussion.

CAPTAIN NOLAN hoped, that in the event of any changes being made, the Mutiny Act would continue to be an annual Act, otherwise they would lose what was the chief guarantee for the liberties of the people next to the right of voting the Supplies. He approved the suggestion that some change should be made in the procedure of courts martial, strongly condemning the cumbersome and unnecessary formalities observed in those tribunals, and particularly the absurd routine of taking down the whole of the evidence in writing. It involved a great waste of time and trouble, and was totally opposed to the practice in civil cases.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he had much pleasure in acknowledging the great knowledge which the right hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Clare had brought to bear upon the subject under consideration. He would admit that the time had come when that matter must undergo some re-consideration. He could not, however, think that the mode suggested by the right hon. and learned Baronet would be the most convenient, because under it there might be a mishap, and the Mutiny Act might expire. The Mutiny Act should, he thought, be passed at the beginning of the next Session, and should continue up to the end of the following Session. In that way, they would have clear time to go into the question. He thought it would also be of great advantage to place before any Committee which should be appointed the principles on which it was proposed to act, or even a detailed Bill. That was what he had in his own mind, and what his right hon. Friend (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) was preparing to do. That subject had not been lost sight of by the present Government. The War Office was never without work; it had always some very great questions before it which took up much time; and they had also had in that House abundant occupation for hon. Members without going into that matter in a separate Committee. But the time had come when it might fairly be discussed. Therefore, at the beginning of next Session, they could continue the Mutiny Act in the ordinary way till the end of the then next Session; and, in the meantime, a Committee might sit on the recommendations to be submitted by the Government, and go fully and carefully into the question. The right hon. and learned Baronet appeared to have studied the subject well. He had made a very clear statement; and if they had his assistance on the Committee he had no doubt they would arrive at some conclusion.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR thanked the Secretary of State for War for his statement as to an inquiry into our military law, and urged on him the importance of having their military law, and also the mode of putting it into execution, clearly declared. He also thought that the unnecessary, and, indeed, in many respects, dangerous repetition, and in some instances the erroneous repetition of military obligations in the Articles of War, of the law military as stated in the Mutiny Act, deserved the most serious attention; and he ventured to express a hope that even in the present Session a Select Committee might be appointed.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN also thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the proposal which he had made which entirely met the object which he (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) had in view. He believed that if the Committee sat in the next Session they would be able to effect a great amendment of the present law.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £243,300, Medical Establishments and Services.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR expressed a hope that in future a statement would be given as to the number of medical officers in India, as compared with the number in this country and the colonies. The changes of late years in the War Office Estimates in showing the numbers and grades of medical officers had completely vitiated the comparison of the numbers and grades now employed with those of a few years previously. At present the medical officers employed in India were entirely omitted from the Estimates.

DR. CAMERON complained that there were not enough medical men in the Army, and thought that something more should be done to attract candidates. If an Army Corps was required to leave the country with its complement of medical officers, only about 50 medical officers would be left in the country.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the Medical Director General believed the country was never better provided with a medical Staff than at present, and he was certain that that gentleman would not have made such a statement without his having good grounds for doing so.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £534,000, Militia Pay and Allowances.

MR. HAYTER rose to call attention to the small number of Officers, now serving in the Militia, who had received certificates of efficiency, and the difference between the numbers enrolled in certain regiments and their Establishment. The aggregate numbers of all ranks on the Establishment for the United Kingdom was 134,500, of which number only 100,611 were present at inspection. There were wanting to complete the number on the Establishment, 19,002; while the number absent without leave was 11,392, which would leave the Force 30,394 short of its proper strength. From the remainder must also be deducted 30,000 for the Militia Reserve, who were liable to serve in any regiment and for any service, and this would reduce the Force to 73,000 men. Deducting a further number of 5,000 for sick servants, cooks, and batmen, the available Force would be reduced to 68,000. This was a state of things which no one could call satisfactory. Taking a few special instances, he found the 4th Lancashire, having an establishment of 1,200, was 578 deficient at the last training; the 5th Lancashire, with a similar establishment, was 558 deficient; the Nottingham and Rutland, with a strength of 1,400, was 563 deficient; the 2nd Surrey, with a force of 990, was 491 deficient; the Cornwall Rangers, with a force of 800, was 442 deficient; the 2nd Middlesex, with a force of 1,050, was 421 deficient; and the Aberdeen, with a force of 741, was 423 deficient; the seven regiments being short by 3,476, or, on the average, of nearly 500 each. The proportion of officers was largely in excess of that of the men, there being present at the inspection of the Cornwall Rangers, 20 officers to 323 men, or one officer to every 16 men; in the 4th Lancashire, 29 officers to 513 men, or one officer to 18 men; and in the Aberdeen, 21 officers to 301 men, or one officer to 15 men. It was, in his opinion, very unsatisfactory that such a large Staff of officers should be kept up, while it was found impossible to get their Militia regiments up to the Establishment. The right

hon. Gentleman had, he believed, taken some steps to improve the state of affairs by inducing men by an offer of increased bounty to re-enrol themselves; but one defect in this scheme was that no limit had been put to the number of times a man might be re-enrolled. He would like to know if, apart from what he had just mentioned, any steps had been taken to increase the Establishment of the Militia. He quite agreed with the suggestion, which he believed emanated from His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, that the Militia should undergo their month's training in the ranks of the Line, and this, he felt sure, would have a very great effect on the efficiency of the men. He wished also to call attention to the fact that out of 2,552 officers of the Militia only 558, or 25 per cent, had received certificates of proficiency; while in the Volunteers, they had been obtained by 75 per cent of the officers. It was to be noticed, however, that in Militia regiments there was an inspection on each grade of promotion. The evidence of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief showed that he laid great stress upon the superior utility of large schools of instruction as compared with schools at depôts, and he (Mr. Hayter) had no doubt that the Secretary of State for War would think it important that certificates should be obtained from them. But, as things were, it was plain that either the schools were of no use, or a larger proportion of officers ought to get certificates from them. He felt sure it would greatly benefit the Service if a higher number of officers were compelled to pass through the schools.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for War to give the Committee some information as to the intentions of the Government with regard to the numerical titles of Line regiments.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the hon. and gallant Member was out of Order in discussing that point upon a Vote for the Militia.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he thought that, as the Report of the Militia Committee was on the Table, and it dealt with the amalgamation of the Militia with the Line, that he was in Order.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. and gallant Member could raise any question as to the organization of the Militia, but not as to the Army on that particular Vote.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, in that case, he would be satisfied with making a few remarks, and he would simply ask the Secretary of State for War, if he would inform the Committee whether it was the intention of the Government to amalgamate the Militia with the Line in one regiment, in accordance with the recommendations of the Militia Committee. He asked that question, because the answer given by the hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary on a former occasion did not contain that information; and in any answer which he might now receive, he hoped it would not be attributed to him, as it was on a former occasion, that he was actuated by what was called a "trades union jealousy." His object was to benefit the Militia; and to show the earnestness of what he said, he would refer to a pamphlet which he wrote a few years ago, and in which he propounded an amalgamation scheme for the Militia and Line regiments. He wished also to ask the Secretary of State for War, whether it was intended to carry into effect any other recommendations of the Militia Committee, besides those relating to the amalgamation of Militia regiments with the regiments of the Army?

EARL PERCY trusted that whatever steps the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War might think it necessary to take in regard to the examination of Militia officers and their entering schools, he would not press too hardly upon them, and that he would bear in mind that Militia officers already gave up one month continuously of their time in the course of a year, which was more than was demanded of the Volunteer officers. Without desiring in any way to undervalue the schools and the examination system, his experience convinced him that officers who had not passed the examinations were often as efficient for all practical purposes as those who had passed them. Certainly, the most serious point in reference to the Militia was the difficulty of obtaining recruits, and the increasing number of absentees. He found on comparing one regiment with another, that the numbers of these men were apt to fluctuate with the rate of wages, rising, for the most part, when wages were high, and falling when they were low, although now and then a precisely contrary effect was observable. But there was no question, that throughout the country generally, the number of absentees had steadily increased, year by year, since 1871. Roughly speaking, he found that in 1871 there were 8,000 absent without leave; that in 1872 there were rather more than 8,000; that in 1873 the number was 11,000; that in 1874 it was 10,000; while in 1875 it rose to 10,925, and in 1876 to 11,864. It must be remembered, too, that in 1874 and in 1875 the Establishment amounted to 131,000, whilst in 1876 it was reduced to 125,000; so that while the Establishment had been reduced, the number of absentees had still increased. These figures showed not only that we had not the men we ought to have for active service, but that a large sum of money—from £8,000 to £10,000 a-year, and likely to increase—was lost to the country. He was aware that many proposals had been made for dealing with this difficulty; but he thought the best plan was, that as the circumstances and requirements of the different regiments varied so greatly as they did, some discretion should be left to the commanding officers, the more so as each was interested in seeing his regiment as full as possible. All Militiamen must regard with satisfaction most of the conclusions at which the Committee had arrived. Nothing had given him more pleasure than to find that the Committee had consistently condemned the changes which Lord Cardwell was trying to bring about, which tended to the swallowing up of the permanent Staff of the Militia in the depôts and to destroying the individuality of the Force; and had recommended that the Militia should have a Staff that would make it a really reliable Force. At the time, those who knew the Militia best, told Lord Cardwell those changes would not be successful. He was disappointed that while the Government adopted certain recommendations of the Committee which he should have desired to see rejected, they had rejected others which he should have liked to see adopted. He trusted they would receive some statement from the Government, as to how many of the Committee's recommendations it was proposed to adopt. He thought there was some reason to complain, too, that some of the changes embraced in the last Circular of the War Office should have been adopted without opportunity having been given to the House for discussing them, and that the Report of the Committee was not sooner placed in the hands of Members. They had been told by the Financial Secretary that it was delayed because the gentleman who was employed indexing it had other important duties to perform, but another might have been employed for the purpose. Before it was issued, the Government had adopted almost the only change to which he would take exception, that which transferred part of the correspondence from the commanding officer to the adjutant. It seemed rather a strong proceeding to take out of the hands of the commanding officer any part of the business connected with his regiment. The command of recruits was also taken from him, and it was an unusual proceeding to deprive him of the command of any portion of a regiment. He hoped the recommendation as to undress clothing would not be adopted, unless care were taken that full dress was issued to the Militia when brigaded with other troops. The recommendation that recruits should be drilled for three months would not answer, seeing that it was difficult enough to get recruits at all; and this was one of the matters that might be left to the discretion of the commanding officer, who knew the requirements of his district.

COLONEL ALEXANDER asked for information regarding the delay in issuing the Warrant which it was understood gave a promise of 30s. to Militiamen on re-enrolment. Its non-appearance was causing great dissatisfaction in several regiments.

MR. STANLEY said, that with regard to the question raised by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Hayter), who had called attention to the small number of officers serving in the Militia who had received certificates of efficiency, it had to be borne in mind that there was an essential difference in the way in which the training of the two Forces—the Militia and the Volunteers—was conducted. It must also be remembered that, although out of 3,700 Militia officers, only 748 had received certificates, that by no means represented the absolute standard of efficiency in that branch of the Profession. There was no doubt that many of the officers who had not received certificates of efficiency—either from the difficulty of finding the necessary time through their avocations, or from other causes—were not inferior; while, in many cases, they might be superior for all purposes of command and in general knowledge of the Service to those officers who, with whatever credit to themselves, might have passed the examination at a particular time and qualified themselves for particular service. At the same time, he did not mean in any way to detract from the credit which was due to those Volunteers who had so qualified themselves. With regard to the men, the hon. Member said that the numbers actually enrolled in certain regiments differed very widely from their Establishment numbers. He went, indeed, further, and pointed out that the men who were actually present fell short of the numbers enrolled. That, it must be admitted, was one of the weak points of our Militia system, and the Committee did not see their way to overcome the difficulty except by various subsidiary means. Desertions occurred when the Militia were enrolled in densely, and also in thinly, populated districts. In the former, when a man went away, you might as well, to use a popular phrase, “look for a needle in a bottle of hay.” In the thinly populated districts, want of work and the fluctuations of employment often rendered it impossible for the recruits to remain in the district. A great number of these desertions, or the shortness of numbers, arose in the case of men who did not fulfil their first engagement. In large towns where the men were enrolled in the autumn months, it sometimes required 600 or 700 recruits to bring the regiment up to its proper strength, and it was difficult to exercise so much care in the selection of men as to secure that they should come up when called for. Major Maxwell pointed out to the Committee the difficulty of getting men to notify their change of residence; and as to the references they were expected to give, they were but little removed as a class from the men who referred to them, and were not to be relied upon. The hon. Member for West Cornwall (Sir John St. Aubyn) gave valuable evidence of the opposite difficulty in thinly-populated districts—as to the scarcity of men. After considering this evidence, the Committee, though with some doubts in their minds, did not see their way to recommend a complete change in the system of recruiting; and they rather directed their attention to other means by which men would be induced to enter the Militia, and to keep there. In adhering to the system of sub-districts in preference to the system of “territorial regiments,” it was only intended that the Militia should remain in their existing position. The Committee thought that the recruiting should be carried on as now by the permanent Staff, and that they should be encouraged to obtain better references and a personal knowledge of recruits. The adjutants of Militia only received their actual expense, instead of £3 a company as formerly to cover all expenses. That allowance of £3 was complained of as in some cases insufficient; while, in others, it went into the pocket of the officer. The Committee wished to place the matter on a sound footing, and while they adhered to the payment of actual expenses, they decided to recommend a certain amount of head-money to be given to cover the expenses of enrolment. After some discussion it was settled that 2s. 6d. should be allowed for each Militia recruit, and this had been approved by the War Office, and would in future be given. With respect to the question of bounty, there were no doubt good reasons for thinking that if all bounty were stopped in the Militia, as in the Army, the change would probably in the long run have no effect on the recruiting; but the Committee, having regard to the evidence they received from all quarters as to the practical working of the system, and having regard also to the purely hypothetical character of the evidence in favour of the change, came to the conclusion that it would be hazardous, if not impossible, to do away at present with the practice of paying something down on enrolment. It was a custom in country districts to pay something down on making a bargain, and, probably, in many cases, a man who was enrolled would not think he had actually committed himself to an engagement, unless he received something on the occasion. It was also to be borne in mind that there were some men who enrolled under the pressure of immediate want. Complaint had been made of the regulation made by Lord Cardwell, when at the War Office, with regard to Militia bounty, that whereas formerly a man served five years for £6, he had now to serve six years for the same sum. That was done by dividing the bounty for the first year into two halves. It had been found advisable to do away with the running account, and to pay 10s. on enrolment and £1 for each year's service. That arrangement was to take effect after a certain date. On financial, as well as other grounds, it was thought advisable to encourage re-enrolment. Besides the advantages as regarded cost, and efficiency in having re-enrolled men, there was the further consideration that it was pretty certain they would turn up, for it was very rarely the case that they deserted. It was proposed to carry out the recommendations of the Committee as to discharge for the purpose of joining the Regular Army, and as to discharge during the non-training period. Steps were also being taken in order to ascertain in what way schools for the non-commissioned officers could be best carried out at the Brigade Depôts. As it was doubtful whether the non-commissioned officers would attend in large numbers, it was not thought wise to establish large central schools. At certain of the Brigade Depôts, however, schools would be set up where those who wished would be able to obtain certificates. With regard to additional training in musketry, this subject had been referred to the Inspector General of Musketry. It was still under consideration, and steps would be taken to secure that such rifle instruction as the Militia had to go through during their necessarily limited period of training should at all events be as efficient as possible. With respect to the question of barracks, and the accommodation at the Brigade Depôts, it would be premature to discuss it at present, inasmuch as the Secretary of State had appointed a Committee consisting of the Quartermaster General, Colonel Bulwer, Sir Howard Elphinstone, and Major Ellice, who would visit the Brigade Depôts and see how the requirements in each case were met. This Committee had not yet reported. With respect to the grievance of officers who were called up to take charge of recruits, arrangements had been made which would give a greater elasticity to the Regulation on the subject, and which it was believed would go far to meet the difficulty of the case. In the matter of clothing certain additional articles would be provided. With regard to the duties of the permanent Staff, the Secretary of State had decided to carry out the recommendation of the Committee, and to consider it as a principle that each Militia battalion should, as far as possible, have a complete Staff of its own. It was not necessary or advisable that there should in every case be an Adjutant appointed for each battalion separately; but it was thought essential to have a Quartermaster for every battalion, in order that proper care might be taken of the stores, and that there might be an officer responsible for them. As the two Quartermasters of the regiment could very well do the work of the Brigade Depot between them, it was intended to dispense with the Quartermaster of the depot. It was also intended to assign as part of the distinct duties of the Quartermaster, not carrying extra pay, the duty of acting as sub-accountant to the Paymaster. There was the recommendation that the non-commissioned officers should be placed on the same footing as those of the Line with respect to allowances. To carry out that proposal would cost £18,000 per annum, and it was not thought expedient to incur so large an expense. It had been decided that where the permanent Staff only discharged their former duties, they were to receive the old rate of pay; but that where they were called up to perform Army duties at Brigade Depôts, the allowances that the Committee recommended should be made to a number not exceeding 25 per cent, although it was impossible to carry out the recommendations of the Committee on the subject to the full extent. With regard to the extra training of the Militia Reserve, the hon. Member for Bath and the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) would be aware that the general result of the inquiries that had been made on this point, was to incline the Committee not to recommend the extension of the training of the Militia Reserve, for the present. Finally, with regard to the question whether the large increase in the expenditure which had been determined upon had been accounted for, his answer was that, with the one exception, of the cost of giving the full, instead of the half-year's bounty, the whole of the additional expenditure had been charged for in the Estimates. Although the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had not been able at an earlier period of the year to announce that he had finally concluded his negotiations with the Treasury, he was now in a position to state that, with the exception of those recommendations of the Committee which he had stated could not be carried out, and of those which had been spoken of the other evening, all the remaining recommendations of the Militia Committee would be carried into effect. He apologized for the length of time during which he had occupied the attention of the Committee, but explained that the right hon. Gentleman was anxious that the earliest opportunity should be taken of giving the fullest explanation on these subjects.

SIR JOHN ST. AUBYN asked, what had been done with regard to the uniform of the Militia regiments?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that no actual decision had yet been arrived at, but the Government were of opinion that it was very desirable that the uniform of the Militia should be made to correspond as far as possible with that of the Line, while the facings could be regulated as was thought desirable.

COLONEL NAGHTEN thought that the Ballot Acts should be amended so as to allow them to be put into operation.

COLONEL RUGGLES-BRISE hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to point to some steps about to be taken with the view of increasing the number of Militia officers, of whom he was afraid there would be a scarcity in a short time.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR remarked that if it was important as a matter of public policy to pass a large number of men through the ranks of the Regular Army as quickly as possible, then it was strange that the Militia organization was not adapted to the object for which the Army was now made subordinate. Whilst service in the Regular Army was limited to three years, the service in the Militia was fixed at six years, with the power of allowing men to extend their service for a further period. He could not help wishing a return to the old practice of last century of training the Militiamen by companies and half companies, so that no man could be taken away from home beyond a five mile radius. With this limitation, and with the aid of experienced and thoroughly trained drill instructors, there was no reason for limiting the numbers to be trained to the present small force of 130,000 Militiamen. No doubt this kind of training would interfere with the pomp and dignity of commanding officers of Militia regiments; but then the nation would be the gainer of having many hundred thousands of sufficiently trained men in the elementary part of military drills to get them to join the cadres of the Regular Army, and then, in a few weeks, to become efficient soldiers in the regimental and brigade exercises and drills.

MR. RITCHIE thought it would be satisfactory to the Committee if the Secretary of State for War could say when the difficulties which had hitherto stood in the way of the propagation of the new Militia Warrant were likely to be removed, and when the Warrant itself would probably be issued. He hoped it would be as soon as possible, because he believed it would have a good effect, in that it would secure a large number of troops who were now holding back. He wished also to know, whether non-commissioned officers of the Militia were to have accommodation in the new barracks? Some of the non-commissioned officers of the 2nd Surrey Militia had made complaints as to the deficiency of barrack accommodation at Guildford.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that, in consequence of a letter having been sent to him by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, he had caused inquiries to be made respecting the barrack accommodation at Guildford, but had not yet received a reply. With regard to the Warrant, no date could be given at which it would appear; but he could assure the hon. Gentleman that the difficulties which had been referred to were practically at an end; but, at the same time, it would not do to give one regiment an advantage over another, and, therefore, practically it would apply to all the regiments of Militia before their next training. In reply to the hon. and gallant Member for East Essex (Colonel Brise) he had no doubt the proposed change with regard to commissions out of the Militia would tend to increase the number of officers, instead of diminishing them.

(4.) £74,400, Yeomanry Cavalry Pay and Allowances.

COLONEL HOOD expressed a hope that several of the recommendations made by the Committee of the War Office three years ago would be carried into effect. The Government ought, in his opinion, to allow the men when out for the summer drill a more liberal remuneration per day, and should provide horses for them for the time from the Regular Army. The Government should give a little more encouragement to those who wished to keep up the strength of the regiments, and to those who wished to join them.

An hon. MEMBER referred to the recommendations of the Committee appointed to inquire into the Yeomanry Cavalry, and said that the Government had treated them in a very unsatisfactory manner. Whenever anything like reductions had been suggested, they had been eagerly seized upon by the War Office; but, whenever any compensating advantages had been proposed they had been completely passed over. Every succeeding Session fresh requirements were exacted from the Yeomanry, and they were now in a considerably worse position than they occupied some years ago. To take one example; they had no longer the advantage of being exempted from the horse duty, which, in one sense, had been a great benefit to them.

MR. WHALLEY complained of the discouragement and disfavour that the Yeomanry received at the hands of the Government. General Stephenson said that 14 days' training would be necessary for the Volunteers to be made useful, and he asked that the Yeomanry should have 14 days' training.

MR. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT said, he had the honour of commanding a detachment of Yeomanry, and was anxious to say something in favour of that Force. The late Government did a great deal to discourage the Yeomanry; but while Lord Cardwell chastised them with whips, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hardy) touched them up with scorpions. Certainly, they had not received much encouragement from the present Government. He knew that they had to correspond for weeks and weeks about a matter of eighteenpence for stationery. A time might come when the Government might regret that treatment.

LORD ESLINGTON said, that no one complained of the Government requiring the greatest amount of efficiency for the Yeomanry, and he did not wish them to spend one shilling on the Yeomanry Force more than was requisite and advisable; but if the War Office required greater efficiency, it was bound to pay a reasonable portion of the expense of attaining that efficiency. He thought it would be well if they had an understanding with the War Office as to whether they appreciated the Yeomanry Force or not. If they did, it ought to be properly maintained.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he had never commanded Yeomanry or other troops; and he hoped if he ever did, he should not be, as he had been just now, fired on from behind. He had been credited with having a Committee for the purpose of destroying the Yeomanry, when he put upon it four most distinguished Yeomanry officers, who practically carried everything their own way. As to trumpeters, they had to be paid for a whole year when they were required to blow a trumpet for only a few days, and it was thought possible to make other arrangements to obtain their services when they were required. The Yeomanry was one of the oldest and one of the best Forces of its kind, and his object had been to encourage good regiments and discourage bad ones, and raise the standard of efficiency as much as possible. He had not tried to encourage bad ones, nor would he do so. It had not been noticed that there was an increase in this year's Estimates, both in this Vote and in Vote No. 10, and yet he was charged with doing nothing for the encouragement of the Yeomanry. The increase in the pay of adjutants, the abolition of the horse duty, and the audit of accounts, would all be beneficial to them; but there were several regiments too small for adjutants. The Committee recommended that no regiment under 200 strong ought to have an adjutant, and that no regiment without an adjutant ought to be kept up, and the consequence was obvious—that the smaller regiments would ultimately have to be disbanded. He had, however, given them time, in order that they might, if possible, recruit to a higher strength. His object throughout had been the improvement of the Yeomanry and its establishment as an efficient and real Force, and he believed the measures he had taken would have that result.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £468,700, Volunteer Corps Pay and Allowances.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT rose to call attention to the rank and retiring allowances of adjutants of Volunteers, and urged that the Government should do all in its power to make the position of those officers as good as possible, as upon their exertions depended much of the efficiency of the Volunteer Force. That efficiency was increasing year by year; it was most necessary to have a good adjutant in each regiment; and those adjutants who had made their battalions efficient deserved every encouragement. His own adjutant left the Army in 1864, when he was a captain in the 10th Foot, and in 1874, under new regulations, he and others were made temporary captains in the Army, and they ranked only with Volunteers from that date, whereas many had been captains for some years, and in the instance of his own adjutant, from 1864. That was a great hardship and deserved consideration, as the rank ought to be given from the date of the first appointment, and this, as well as the rank of major, with which he would now deal, would cost the country nothing. As to the retiring rank of major, according to the old Regulations a man if retired from ill-health, provided he had been five years an adjutant of Volunteers and had 20 years' service in the Army, might retire with the rank of major; but if he had served 15 years in the Volunteers, whatever might be his service in the Army, he could retire with the same rank. That surely was not to place him on the same footing as if he were in the Militia. When Lord Cardwell first introduced his scheme, he treated the Militia and Volunteers as Reserved Forces, and the adjutants of both exactly in the same way. But since that, the Secretary of State for War had been anxious to establish a new system in the Militia, and had given certain retiring allowances to the adjutants of Militia, provided they retired by a certain day, and he had been informed that some of them had even been allowed to retire since that day. But, be that as it may, he should like to see adjutants of Volunteers placed upon the same footing, and get the same chance. Inasmuch as they had as much, if not more, to do in the course of the year than the adjutants of Militia, they ought, in his opinion, at least to have the offer of the same retiring allowances, and the right hon. Gentleman would take away every grievance by granting these small concessions. He also thought it was scarcely right that these men should be required to go before a medical Board and be absolutely invalided before they were held to be entitled to a retiring allowance.

COLONEL MURE, concurring very much in all that had fallen from the last speaker, insisted upon the expediency of paying regard to vested interests, observing that it was hardly fair that when an officer assumed the duties of Volunteer adjutant, and was entitled to the receipt of a certain annual sum for the purpose of keeping a horse, he should receive merely an allowance for hiring one. He would suggest, too, that the officers who became Volunteer adjutants before 1872 and those who became Volunteer adjutants after that year should be put on the same footing. He should, as a Volunteer officer, he might add, like to see some compulsory audit of accounts instituted throughout the Volunteer Army, that some further allowance would be made for the formation of Volunteer camps, and a roster of the whole of the Force throughout the country properly kept.

MR. MARK STEWART asked the Secretary of State for War to give due consideration to the urgency of this question with reference to adjutants' allowances. He would also suggest to the right hon. Gentleman to make a pecuniary grant for the purpose of facilitating the muster of Artillery corps in different parts of the country. On the West Coast of Scotland many Artillery corps were brought together at one spot, and the main expense of the gathering fell upon the officers, which was hardly a fair state of things.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY urged that since the Volunteers were now recognized as a permanent Force available for the defence of the country, they ought to receive more encouragement from the Government, and suggested whether for the purpose of increasing and developing that Force, it might not be advisable to divert a portion of the sum presently devoted to the Militia. He pressed on the Government the desirability of having a Royal Commission or a Committee of the House appointed to consider the best means of still further increasing the numbers and efficiency of the Volunteers, and introducing a better system into that service.

MR. KNIGHT complained of the treatment which adjutants employed in the Volunteer Force had received in the way of pay and retiring allowances, and expressed a hope that the Government would deal with them generously, especially the old adjutants who had done so much from the outset of the movement to make the Force what it now was—those who had borne the burden and heat of the day—by giving them the same retiring allowance which they would have been entitled to if they had continued to serve as captains in the Regular Army.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN thought it was a matter of very great importance that the Committee should be informed whether the Volunteer Force was properly officered or not, for, according to a letter written by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) which had appeared in The Times of that morning, they constituted the real Force of the country. That letter ought not to pass without notice, for it contained the statement that the Force was inefficiently led. If they were the illusory Force which some hon. Members seemed to suppose, it would be well that that fact should be made known on the authority of the Minister who was responsible for our military administration.

COLONEL BERESFORD, referring to the pay of the adjutants, pointed out that the price of the provisions was much higher than it was 20 years ago, and that that circumstance ought to be taken into consideration in dealing with the case. The pay only amounted to 15s. 3d. a-day, and out of that the officer had to pay for his horse.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that of course he could not be supposed to think the Volunteers not worth having. He drew an entirely opposite conclusion from the letter of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) to that which had been drawn by the hon. Member for King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien). He thought his noble Friend had shown too much sensitiveness at the remarks made by the inspecting officer. He did not think Volunteers should be too sensitive of the remarks of inspecting officers, whose duty it was not only to applaud their merits, but to tell them their faults. Had the hon. Baronet been present at an earlier stage of the evening, he would have heard it stated that so far from the officers of the Volunteer Force being uninstructed, the contrary was the case, so far as a large portion of them were concerned. At the same time it was not, of course, to be supposed that Volunteer officers with the limited time and means of drill and manœuvring at their disposal could take their place at once on a level with the officers of the Regular Army, nor was it matter for wonder that when inspected by a member of the Household Brigade he should have made some criticisms on the manner in which they had performed their duty in the field. He, however, deduced from the statements of the gallant general who acted in that capacity that the Volunteers would, in case of necessity, be found to be a very efficient Force, although he did not agree with the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) and those who contended that they could take the place of the Regular Army. There was much, he might add, in his opinion, in what had fallen from his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot) with respect to Volunteer adjutants; but he must remind him that their pay had been increased from 8s. a-day and 2s. allowance for forage to 15s. 3d. The conditions, however, imposed upon them as to retiring allowances were, he admitted, somewhat hard, considering the long service of some officers, and he would undertake that point should be carefully considered. But that officers who retired from the Army, and accepted conditions with which they were perfectly acquainted, should be restored to the positions which they would have occupied had they continued all the time in the Army was to take a view of their case in which he could not concur. The Volunteer Artillery he regarded as one of the most important branches of the Service, and what they had done at Shoeburyness last year and in previous years tended to show the excellence of that Force. It was intended they should try this year the new guns, which, if they were ever called upon to defend any of our fortresses, they would have to use, and he trusted that the trial of these guns would still further increase their efficiency. He could assure the Committee that the efficiency of the Volunteer Force excited the deepest interest in his mind.

MR. WHALLEY did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that there were impediments to the Volunteers becoming an efficient Force. He denied that statement of the right hon. Gentleman, and regarded the Volunteers as a most efficient Force. With regard to the Regular Army, which was jealous of the Volunteers, he thought it was twice as expensive as it ought to be. Encouragement ought to be given to the Volunteer Force, and that might be done by placing them under the command of skilled officers.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY explained that what he desired was that the Volunteers should be encouraged by all possible facilities of drill and other means of increasing their efficiency. The whole character of the Force, however, so much depended upon the officers and the relation in which they stood to the men, that he had not the slightest intention to propose that they should be replaced by officers of the Regular Army.

MR. DILLWYN, as a Volunteer, had always found the War Office ready to listen to any reasonable representations, and so far from any jealousy manifesting itself on the part of the Regular Army, he had always found the greatest disposition to assist the Volunteers. He was sorry to see the House to-night resolving itself into a committee of grievances, instead of considering and agreeing to the Army Votes.

MR. BULWER begged to thank the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War for promising to consider the question as to the retirement of Volunteer adjutants. After 17 years' experience as an officer of Volunteers, he most emphatically repudiated the statement of the hon. Member for Peterborough, that the Regular Army were jealous of the Volunteers. On the contrary, the Volunteers had invariably received from the Army the greatest assistance, and from the officers of the Army the utmost kindness and cordiality. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had spoken of the limited opportunities which Volunteer officers had of acquiring a knowledge of their duties. On behalf of officers commanding Metropolitan Corps, he would give an instance in which their opportunity was limited indeed. Many of them were annually ordered out into Hyde Park for instruction in brigade drill, and when they got there, owing to the crowds of people who were allowed to interfere with them, it was impossible for men or officers to see or hear what was going on. For all purposes of instruction, such drills were worse than useless; and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to take some steps to remedy this, so that on future occasions it might be possible for one battalion commander to see at least what the battalion next to him in brigade was doing.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER complained that Ireland was not allowed to have Volunteer corps.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £132,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Army Reserve Force Pay and Allowances (including Enrolled Pensioners), which will come in course of payment from the 1st day of April 1877 to the 31st day of March 1878, inclusive."

CAPTAIN NOLAN commented at some length on the condition of the Reserve Forces, which he argued were a complete failure.

Shortly after midnight,

MR. O'CONNOR POWER moved to report Progress. He objected to voting away public money at that late hour. The protests of hon. Members against unnecessary expenditure were never attended to at that time, when the only object of the Government was to hurry through the Votes as speedily as possible. The people of Ireland contributed to the expense of the Volunteer Force of England, but was not allowed to have Volunteers of her own. ["Question!"] Surely it was the right of the Members from Ireland to raise the question of the justice and expediency of this when they were asked to vote the money. He moved that the Committee do now report Progress.

Motion made, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. O'Connor Power.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY opposed the Motion to report Progress; observing that there was nothing unusual or inconvenient in the Committee considering Votes in Supply—sometimes of considerable amount and importance—at a much later hour than had then arrived. The Vote now before the Committee had nothing whatever to do with the Volunteer Force, nor did there appear to be any opposition to it.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, the right hon. Gentleman had given no answer to the question raised by the hon. Member for Mayo, relative to the Volunteer Force in Ireland. If there was not time to answer the objections raised by hon. Members, it was time that the discussion should be postponed, and he should support the Motion to report Progress.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the question of the Reserve Forces had already been fully discussed on the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms). It was impossible, on taking Votes in Supply, to enter into such criticism of details as was raised by the hon. and gallant Member. He hoped the Vote would be allowed to be taken.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, the right hon. Gentleman admitted that it was impossible to give an answer to objections raised at that hour of the night. Surely that was a sufficient reason why the Committee should now report Progress.

MR. PARNELL said, no answer was given to the Question of his hon. Friend the Member for Mayo, and he thought his Motion to report Progress was perfectly reasonable.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he should certainly divide the Committee on the Question.

MR. O'DONNELL moved that the Chairman do now leave the Chair. If the hour was so late that the right hon. Gentleman could not give an explanation of the Votes proposed, it was time that the Committee should cease.

Motion made, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY trusted the hon. Member would not resist the large majority by which the Motion to report Progress had just been negatived. There was no question of principle involved. As to the Question of the hon. Member for Mayo, the subject of Volunteers in Ireland was not before the Committee, and therefore he had not answered the hon. Gentleman's remarks.

Motion made, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Major O'Gorman.)

The Motion being received with expressions of disapprobation,

MR. GREENE urged the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford not to persist in his opposition. For himself, he was prepared to sit to any time to prevent the policy of obstruction which appeared to have been adopted by some hon. Members opposite.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER was understood to describe the speech of the hon. Member for Bury as "hypocritical." [Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN said, the expression used by the hon. Member for Mayo was un-Parliamentary.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that what he had said, or meant to say, was not that the speech was "hypocritical," but "hypercritical." [This explanation was very unfavourably received, and was the commencement of a long period of confusion.]

MR. ANDERSON, referring to the argument of the hon. Member for Mayo, that the Irish people contributed to the expense of the English Volunteers, desired to point out that a good deal of English and Scotch money went to pay for the Irish police.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER interposed, and said, that the hon. Member for Glasgow had travelled equally out of the record. The Irish Volunteers were not before the Committee, neither were the English—it was simply a Vote for the Reserve Forces. But he rose to express his hope that the Committee would be allowed to proceed with the Vote, and that nothing would occur that might render it necessary to make a change in the established Rules of Debate.

MR. PARNELL, MR. O'DONNELL, and other Members addressed the Committee, speaking amid great confusion and continued cries of "Order! Order!" "Chair! Chair!" "Question! Question!"

MR. O'DONNELL addressed the Committee in support of the Motion to report Progress, at great length and with little relevance to the Question.

The uneasiness and displeasure of the Committee was such that at length an hon. Member (Sir William Edmonstone) rose and moved that the Committee be counted.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

[A.M. 1.50]

MR. O'DONNELL proceeded in his speech, being continuously met with cries of "Question! Question!" "Divide! Divide!" and calls to Order.

THE CHAIRMAN repeatedly attempted to enforce the rules of debate by injunctions of "Order!"

MR. O'DONNELL, however, continued his address; urging, with constant iteration, the impropriety of debating important questions or voting away large sums of public money at midnight. The hon. Member enforced his argument by repeatedly referring to the examples of the Senates of Greece and Rome, which conducted their deliberations by daylight; and the more modern examples of Germany and France, whose Assemblies met at mid-day and separated at an early hour of the afternoon.

MR. PULESTON rose to Order. The arguments of the hon. Member for Dungarvan were utterly irrelevant to the Question before the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN said he had repeatedly pointed out to the hon. Member that he was transgressing the rules of debate. The hon. Member, he must say, seemed disposed to treat the Chair with hardly the usual respect.

MR. O'DONNELL resumed his address, with complete disregard of the reproof—

MR. PULESTON again rose to Order. The hon. Member for Dungarvan was turning the House of Commons into ridicule.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he had not the slightest desire to turn the House of Commons into ridicule: and then resumed his speech at the point of interruption, referring to the procedure of the German Reichstag—

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had already pointed out to the hon. Member that he was breaking through the Rules of Debate. If he persisted, he would look upon his conduct as disrespectful to the Committee, and would be compelled to submit to the Committee whether such conduct should not be brought under the notice of the House.

MR. O'DONNELL, expressing his desire not to infringe the rules of debate, nor to act in any manner disrespectful to the Committee, at length sat down.

MR. LOCKE referred with some indignation to the conduct of the hon. Member, whose expressions of deference to the authority of the Chair, he said, only pretended to be sincere.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chairman if such an imputation was Parliamentary.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the expression was not necessarily un-Parliamentary, unless it imputed personal insincerity to the hon. Member.

MR. LOCKE expressed his regret that the Rules of the House did not permit them to put a stop to speeches such as this, the only object of which seemed to be to waste time and obstruct the Business of the House. I have, said the hon. and learned Member, seen the hon. Member for Dungarvan for the first time to-night, and Heaven knows I do not wish ever to look upon him again. And as for the other hon. Member!—

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Member for Dungarvan had not long been a Member of the House, and perhaps did not know the Rules. Opposed Business was not begun after half-past 12 o'clock. He thought the minority was unreasonable, and that the conduct of the hon. Member for Dungarvan was irregular—to say the least of it.

MR. PARNELL said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was always fair and conciliatory; but the Members of his Party were always ready to throw insult on the Irish Members. He had heard Members on that side say, while the hon. Member for Dungarvan was speaking—“Let us see how much he will stand.”

This statement called forth disorderly cries from Members on the Government benches; which led to a severe call to Order from the CHAIRMAN, and a threat to call one hon. Member by Name if he did not desist.

MR. C. B. DENISON strongly denounced the course now taken by the hon. Members opposite, in obstructing the proceedings of the Committee.

MR. WHALLEY declared that, so far from being ashamed of the conduct of those hon. Members, on the contrary, the part taken by the hon. Member for Dungarvan and those who acted with him filled him with admiration and envy.

MR. PARNELL asked, what did the right hon. Gentleman want? Did he want a victory over five Irishmen? What was the principle he was contending for?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was for this—that a small minority should give way to a large majority. They would not be disgraced by now giving way, seeing that it would be an act of personal courtesy to the officials of the House and to Mr. Speaker, who all this time was waiting.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER declined to give way; and proceeded to address the Committee, when—

[A.M. 3.35]

MR. WHALLEY said, it was ridiculous, and not even honest, to go on with Business at these hours. The Business of the House, he said, should be carried on by the light of day. [A laugh—for it was now broad daylight.] He was prepared to go to the country to-morrow and contest this question. [Mr. D. DAVIES made a remark in Welsh.] Yes, he would undertake to carry the hon. Gentleman's own borough against him on this question—provided he would promise not to address his constituents in Welsh.

MR. O'DONNELL addressed the Committee on the Motion, when—

MR. O'DONNELL said, it was really the Government that was obstructing Business by resisting the Motion for Adjournment. He was ready to sit for 24 hours longer to protest against the shame of this midnight legislation.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, who for a great part of the evening had represented the Leaders of the Opposition, rose, and with great force deprecated a continuance of these undignified proceedings. Enough had been done to vindicate the desire of the Government to get on with Business, but seeing the contest was vain with Members who were determined to listen to no argument or remonstrance, he thought the Government would do well to give way. At the same time, he reminded the present occupants of the Treasury Bench that when they sat opposite, the hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) and others had adopted the same tactics of obstruction which now created so much displeasure when acted on by the hon. Member for Mayo and his Friends.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he greatly regretted the contest that had arisen; but it was not a question whether the Government should give way, but the House.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, who now represented the Government, appealed to hon. Members to allow Business to proceed. The Vote under discussion was proposed before midnight, and had been resisted for upwards of five hours, because the Secretary for War had omitted to answer a question put by an Irish Member which had reference to a Vote that had already been passed.

MR. PARNELL said, that Irish questions were treated in a half contemptuous way, and it was only by determined action that the Representatives from Ireland could force upon the House the conviction that Irish questions were entitled to be respectfully considered.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, the contest was now assuming a very serious character. The supposed slight thrown upon him by the Secretary for War was a very small matter; but the manner in which Irish Members and Irish measures were treated was a very grave matter; and they would continue their opposition as long as the Government liked, in order to enforce the attention of the country. Their opposition was not a pre-arranged business—he was astonished not to find himself in bed. But he felt as though he could remain until Macaulay's New Zealander took up his station on the broken arches of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's, so strongly was he convinced of the principle he was maintaining.

MR. BLAKE remonstrated against these continuous Motions, the real object of which was obstruction and nothing else. The hon. Member for Meath had publicly avowed it. At a public meeting in the Strand, in April last, he had said that as he and his Friends could not meet the Government with cold steel, they would do all they could to thwart them in the ways that were open to them. And at a meeting at the Italian Schools in Hatton Garden, on the 17th of June, he had ventured to speak of the Speaker with marked disrespect; for he was reported to have said that the Speaker looked upon Home Rule Members as a trapper did on vermin.

MR. PARNELL rose, and with great warmth denied that he had ever used such language in reference to the Speaker; and he challenged the hon. Member to produce his authority.

The Times of that date having been procured from the Library, the following extract from the report of a speech attributed to Mr. Parnell on the occasion in question was read:—

“If he (Mr. Parnell) were to tell them that the Speaker was a man of great ability, but that he looked upon Home Rule Members much as a trapper would look upon vermin, he should in all probability incur his displeasure and the consequences of that displeasure. If he were to speak of the way in which the English Members generally performed their duties, he might say a great many unpleasant and very true things. If he told them that the English Members neglected their duties to England and especially to Ireland, he might find himself brought before the House of Commons, and if he were to speak fully of the Irish Members he might incur the charge of telling tales out of school. He should, therefore, ask them to excuse him if he did not tell as much of the truth there as he spoke in the House itself.”

On the passage referring to the Speaker being read, hon. Members expressed much indignation; and an hon. Member said that language disparaging to the Speaker of that House was a breach of the Privileges of the House, and expressed a hope that the conduct of the hon. Member for Meath would be brought under the notice of the House.

MR. PARNELL denied that the language he had used supported the charge brought against him—for if hon. Members had but attended to the passage read to them they would have found that his expression was merely hypothetical—“If he were to tell them——” [“Oh, oh!”]

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE MEDITERRANEAN FLEET.—QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I desire to ask my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have given him private Notice. I beg to ask him, Whether he is able to give any information to the House with regard to the alleged departure of the Mediterranean Fleet from the Piræus?

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, it is a fact, as stated in the newspapers, that orders have been given to the British Fleet to leave the Piræus, where it had been stationed, and return to the station where it was last year—Besika Bay.

UNIVERSITIES OF OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE BILL—(No. 114.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, it would be in the recollection of their Lordships that last year they spent a considerable time in considering the provisions of the University of Oxford Bill. He then expressed a fear lest the labour which their Lordships had expended on that measure might become vain in consequence of the Bill being lost upon the sands of July. That had, unfortunately, turned out to be true. The Bill failed to pass that terrible ordeal which awaited measures in the other House, and which now appeared to be dangerous even to the most necessary measures for the defence of the country. That Bill was re-introduced this Session in the other House, and together with it was incorporated a Bill, which their Lordships had not yet seen, for the University of Cambridge. The objects of the Bill were the same as they were before, and the provisions, he thought, on the whole, had not been sensibly changed. The cause for the introduction of the Bill last year was that a Commission had been issued by the late Government, had sat and examined very carefully into the revenues of the University, and had ascertained that there was a considerable surplus of income more than was necessary for the purposes of the University, purely as an educational body, and that there would, in future years, be a very large increase in that already considerable sum. The Government were certain that Parliament would not consent that so large an addition to the resources of the University should be disposed of without due regard being had to the many wants which had been pointed out and admitted to exist at the University by men of all Parties there, and for which additional resources were requisite. New studies had been introduced, new branches of learning were attracting the attention of numberless students, and new classes of students unconnected with the old institutions and Colleges were flocking in every year to the University. To facilitate the prosecution of those new studies, and to attract and assist those new classes of students, pecuniary resources were very necessary. It was, therefore to bring that supply and that demand together that this Bill was prepared. The method which the Government recommended to Parliament for facilitating the application of those resources to those objects was a very simple one. It was nothing but the creation of a very competent Commission, armed with extensive powers. But they placed a limit to the action of the Bill. They refused to pass beyond the actual requirements of the case—the actual disposal of the money of which the Commission had indicated the existence for purposes which the University felt to be necessary; and the limit which they specially imposed on themselves was that they declined to enter into the difficult fields of controversy connected either with the government of the University, or with the position of the Ecclesiastical Bodies within it. They had not, on the one hand, confined the discretion of the Commission with respect to ecclesiastical subjects, nor, on the other, had they done anything of which the tendency would be to alter the ecclesiastical status quo. In the course of the discussion on the Bill two considerations were pressed on the Government, not only in the House, but by the principal authorities of the University themselves; and on their advice they inserted in the Bill a power for the Commission to deal with the Headships and Fellowships, without any restriction on the ecclesiastical destination of a certain number of those endowments. But at the same time provisions were introduced enforcing those prescriptions which Parliament by the University Tests Act had insisted upon six years ago—that religious instruction and religious worship for members of the Church of England should be provided in all the Colleges. To those objects and limitations they had adhered. The Bill had been altered in some few particulars, but the alterations did not affect its cardinal essence, or the main intention which they had in view. The great and most obvious change was that the University of Cambridge Bill had been incorporated with the University of Oxford Bill, and dealt with by analogous provisions. Beyond that, a considerable change had been made in the constitution of the Oxford University Commission. They found that a general feeling existed that some, at least, of the members of the Commission ought to be closely connected with the existing discipline and studies of the place. That defect was pointed out to him in the course of the passage of the Bill through the House. He confessed that his own inclination was in favour of keeping the Commission impartial in the controversies and contentions which, to an unfortunate extent, Oxford had occasionally experienced. But there was a dominant feeling in both Houses of Parliament that some of the Commissioners should be connected with the discipline and studies of the place; and that was pressed on him by Sir Henry Maine, who urged on him that his own place should be vacated for that purpose, and urged it so earnestly that he had hardly thought it fair to insist on holding Sir Henry Maine to his original promise. The Dean of Chichester had very kindly vacated his position as a Commissioner with the same object; and the two vacancies so made had been filled up by two Gentlemen well known in the University, and connected with its discipline and studies. He had yielded to the resignation of Sir Henry Maine with extreme reluctance; but, making all due allowance for that very great loss, he did not think that the Commission would, on the whole, be found to have seriously suffered by the change. Professor Henry Smith was so well known to many of their Lordships that he felt that change had been in one respect an advantage, from a point of view to which he attached considerable importance, as by that substitution science was now more strongly represented on the Commission than it was originally—namely, by Mr. Justice Grove only. Beyond that he had not any alteration of importance to note in the Bill. The Bill had grown considerably. The 48 clauses which had left that House had now swollen to 61, and the 12 pages had become 19. Some of that additional matter was owing to a certain number of special clauses, perhaps more interesting to the subjects of them than to the public at large. A number of Foundations had been specially named in particular clauses. But it was not necessary to draw their Lordships' attention to those matters of detail. He should be simply wasting their time by entering into them further. Their Lordships had last year fully discussed the measure, and all the principles on which it was founded. All that he had now to say was, that it was highly expedient for the Universities that that Bill should be passed and that controversy settled. It was not good for the Universities that they should be like iron-clads continually in dock, and subjected to perpetual criticism and change.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

LORD COLCHESTER, who had given Notice to move as an Amendment on the Motion for the second reading—

"That legislation with reference to the Universities will be premature unless preceded by an inquiry into the working of the changes effected as to the state, studies, and discipline of those Universities by the legislation of 1854 and 1856," said, that when last Session the Bill dealing with the University of Oxford was laid before their Lordships, he ventured to submit to their consideration a Resolution similar in principle to that which he had placed on the Paper that evening. He regretted then, and he regretted now, to find himself in opposition to the views taken on that subject by Her Majesty's Government and those with whom he generally acted; and he was aware that though several noble Lords concurred in the objection he felt to parts of the Bill, the opinion that a fresh Commission of Inquiry was necessary did not elicit their support. At a later stage, however, two noble Lords on the other side had made a proposal based on very similar grounds in favour of an inquiry to be held by the Executive Commission about to be appointed before proceeding to act in an executive capacity. He (Lord Colchester) did not vote on that question because he certainly could not see that if an inquiry was to be held, it would be of very great use after the principles by which the Commissioners were to be guided were laid down by Parliament and the bounds of their sphere of action to some extent determined by the enumeration of the matters on which alone they were to touch. But since the University question had again come before Parliament opinions had been expressed elsewhere in favour of a view similar to that he had the honour of submitting last year—that before dealing in a very large—he might say in a very drastic—manner with these institutions, it would not be undesirable to investigate their present condition, to collect the opinions of those most conversant with the University in recent years, whether now holding office within it or not, and not commit those who were to carry out changes to any principles of reform until the grounds for such principles in the existing state of it had been established. He could but regard the Bill as proposed as premature in point of time, as in many points revolutionary, where revolutionary change might be hurtful; and, at the same time, leaving many points open which would prevent its effecting any great settlement, if such a settlement were possible. He thought this measure premature, because it was nearly 23 years since Parliament dealt with this subject in a manner which had in a great measure transformed at least the University of Oxford. But the full effects of that measure had scarcely yet been felt—they hardly could be until the whole generation dating from before the reforms of that period had passed away. The whole system of election to fellowships had been altered, and in a great measure, consequently, the character of the Colleges had been in a state of transmutation. He hardly thought it was yet time to pronounce altogether how much of what was new had been altogether good and how much was open to just criticism; and he thought all must acknowledge that nothing could be more unfortunate than that Parliament should be perpetually legislating on these matters, that a fresh University Reform Bill continually should be before the eyes of the Universities, and that the saying of the late Dean of St. Paul's should be realized, which he quoted to their Lordships on a previous occasion. That those who had once used Parliament as an engine for changes in the Universities exemplified Horace's maxim—

If it could be shown that Oxford or Cambridge were falling into the decaying and lifeless condition in which they might have been 100 years ago, he could imagine it being said that not a moment should be lost in doing something to restore fresh life before another race of students had suffered from their inefficiency. But this was not contended. There was, it was true, one reason given against delay which he listened to with great respect because it came from the most rev. Primate. The most rev. Primate contended that it was important for the interests of the University to put an end by a final measure to the unrest and disquiet which the prospect and discussion of change occasioned. He (Lord Colchester) only ventured to doubt whether from what he knew of the general tone and temper of minds in Oxford on these questions, and perhaps also among those interested in them elsewhere, any measure—especially one such as now proposed to their Lordships—would stop the movement for further changes among those who did not find in it precisely the provisions desired by themselves. And in this doubt he was confirmed by what was said on that occasion by the noble Marquess himself—

“I do not entertain the illusory hope that the Bill will be a final effort. The idea of any Bill which will settle the question is a delusion.”

If, then, there was no imperative necessity for legislating at once and without a moment's delay, why were they to depart from the usual course—the course observed in former University legislation

—the course usual when corporations or institutions were to be re-modelled? It was, he knew, said that there was information enough. We had had, it was said, one Commission as to the University revenues; we had had another exhaustive inquiry more than 20 years ago. Well, as to the former Commission, dealing solely with the revenues of these Bodies, taking no notice of their studies or management, it simply was calculated to raise many perplexities and solve nothing—to show apparent anomalies in the distribution of College funds, in no way assist to show if these anomalies had or had not their justification. As regarded the old Commission, no doubt the Report of that Commission was most valuable as to the state of the Universities at the time it was made; but it referred to a state of things so entirely past as to mislead rather than instruct anyone who had no information from other sources. Many great changes had been introduced in consequence of the inquiry of the Commission—and sufficient time had not yet elapsed to enable them to judge of their working; many arrangements proposed had not yet been introduced:—and he contended that to take the inquiry of the Commission of 1854, and to legislate upon it for the Universities now, would be very much like legislating for the municipalities at the present moment from the information obtained about the unreformed municipalities before 1835. The present measure was, therefore, premature, and in some respects it was revolutionary. Last year, he believed, some objection was taken to the phrase “College disendowment,” as applied to this Bill. But there was no doubt that, using the word in a literal sense, whether it be thought a phrase of censure or not, such a description was applicable to a measure the main principle of which was to transfer a large part of the property of the Colleges to the University. The phrase “common fund” seemed to imply that all trace of the origin of funds raised from College property was to be obliterated, and all connection with the institutions bearing the name and commemorating the existence of those who founded them was to be dissolved. Then, again, without any investigation as to their relative usefulness, prize fellowships were to be largely swept away to make room for what were called additional facilities for education. The whole measure proceeded on the arbitrary assumption that those fellowships had little educational value. To those who had considered these fellowships an essential part of the University system, as a stimulus to study, which was one of its most valuable educational influences, this appeared a taint through the whole foundation of the measure, and one which would certainly prevent him from in any way acquiescing with its passing into law. Nothing, surely, was more important than to maintain the influence of University culture and University studies which had hitherto permeated English life. Nothing could be more fatal than in any way to make University studies and University distinctions appear otiose and unfruitful to all who did not intend to devote themselves to the profession of academic teaching. It would be an unhappy day alike for the University and the country when substantial prizes for University success should be in a great measure denied to those who were seeking careers in the outer world. All except those who were at once independent of all pecuniary considerations and endowed with a taste for University study of the higher kind would be tempted to look on it themselves or be encouraged by their friends to regard it as a superfluous and distracting pursuit, of little help to them in the work of professional life. It was true that these prize fellowships might not be wholly abolished—and he was glad to see that the special provisions most pointedly directed against them were not retained this year—but there did seem a disposition to reduce and pare them down to the lowest point. Their Lordships might remember how two men, famous both in public life and literature—Addison and Prior—each, when the turn of fortune withdrew them from public employment, fell back upon the College fellowship which he had never vacated during his years of activity in the service of the State. The Commissioners of 1852 said—

“When the University shall have been put in a condition to offer sufficient inducements to enable it to retain the ablest men in its service it may with safety leave them to follow their inclinations. Fellows thus elected may safely be allowed to pursue the career which they deem best for themselves. They will serve the University in their several professions more effectually ally than they could by residence within its walls. All our remarks have been made with the view of rendering fellowships rewards for past exertions as well as stimulants beforehand."

That was the opinion of those who were eminently qualified to form an opinion upon this subject 23 years ago; and until that opinion was shown to be erroneous, he did not see why it should be put aside. There was another very important point on which as yet they had heard nothing—namely, in whom was to be vested the patronage of the offices to be created and to be paid out of the revenues hitherto administered by the Colleges. To place this patronage at the disposal of Convocation would certainly be contrary to the opinions of most persons who had given attention to the subject. If it were to be vested in the Crown, acting through its Ministers, that would be an arrangement which might not altogether work badly; but which would, whether for good or for evil, introduce, to an extent hitherto unknown, an element of ministerial and political influence into academical affairs. Or was some totally new mode of appointment to be created either within or without the Universities? This was a matter which would be admitted to be a very grave one—a matter not to be decided without a careful examination of various and conflicting considerations; and it was one on which the results of a formal inquiry might have been eminently valuable, and at any rate have spared them the necessity of handing over the alienated endowments of Colleges to be dealt with they knew not how. To pass from what the Bill attempted to settle to what it did not, the first point on which agitation was certain to continue was the clerical fellowship question. He was as desirous as anyone that fellowships of that class should not be done away with altogether, for he thought that since the passing of the University Test Act they were of greater importance than they had been at a previous time. But it did seem a question whether something was not required to strengthen their position before the world. It might be possible to a considerable extent to make them prizes for proficiency in theological study. Fellowships held by men specially distinguished in a different study from others could not be regarded as they sometimes were now, as representing a lower intellectual level than those altogether unrestricted. Another objection would be obviated if these fellowships in all cases required that anyone becoming a candidate should be either in holy orders or under a bond fide engagement to take orders, whether clerical or not; so that the election to such a fellowship could no longer appear to bring persons into the clerical profession who would otherwise have felt no vocation for it, and would have sought a more congenial career in some other walk of life. Lastly, there was left untouched a subject well worthy of investigation—the constitution and government of the University. That constitution in the case of Oxford dated entirely from the last Commission. The Hebdomadal Council Congregations, as now constituted, and the relation of those bodies to Convocation, were entirely the work of legislation founded on the Report of that Commission. These arrangements were in some degree experimental; but they had been tried for 23 years, and if the time were come for dealing with University reform at all, it would be a not unfit question for inquiry whether they in any manner required amendment. He might say, in passing, that as in some quarters great importance was attached to the Hebdomadal Council having put forward a scheme involving a great extension of the Professoriate, the Hebdomadal Council, under the constitution which this Bill left unaltered, was only one of three branches of the University Legislature; and though its opinions were, of course, entitled to much weight, it could not—at least, by those who were satisfied with this Bill—be held to pronounce finally the opinion of Oxford. The composition and powers of these bodies were much controverted topics. Their Lordships had some discussion last year about the composition of Congregation. He (Lord Colchester) was not one of those who desired a change in this respect; but, believing as he did that the needlessness of such a change could be shown, he thought that a full investigation of the subject, such as would have formed part of the duties of an Inquiry Commission, would have given them surer foundations for a right conclusion. As to Convocation, he did desire to see some change in the form in which its functions were exercised. He did not wish to disfranchise the non-resident Masters of Arts in any other sense than the people of England were disfranchised when they sent Representatives to Parliament instead of assembling in a national mass-meeting to vote laws in the style of the Roman Comitia or the Landsgemeinde of Uri. But he would suggest that if it were possible to have a standing body of representatives, each chosen in proportion to their numbers by the Masters of Arts of his College, such a body, while on matters of ecclesiastical or political difference representing the same ideas as at present, would be composed of men carrying a personal weight and of widespread academical reputation, which would give them at once more efficiency and more real power than the chance-gathering of non-residents from all parts of the Kingdom to vote at some election or on some opposed statute with regard to which a few persons at the centre of affairs prosecuted an active canvass. It was not the same case as with the non-resident Fellows of Colleges. They were in general picked men; they were men who by the nature of the case were still intimately connected with the University, and in many cases had, within comparatively few years, been resident in it; while a large number of members of Convocation, never having had any special claim to authority on academic questions, had for the greater part of a lifetime lived altogether apart from University associations, and had no knowledge of their University as it had been since the days of their undergraduate life. What scheme of reform of Convocation was the most practicable might be an open question. The noble Lord opposite, who last year declined to raise the subject, because University reformers were not agreed on it, would, he imagined, have the same reason for not stirring it till Keble and Hertford Colleges were ready to celebrate a centenary. But it was precisely one of the questions which it would have been the duty of a Commission of Inquiry carefully to consider, and it was one of the misfortunes of legislating without inquiry that the House was not in a position to deal with it more satisfactorily. It was for these reasons, which he had endeavoured to go through as concisely as possible, that he had put this Resolution before their Lordships. He feared that some of the details through which he had gone might have been wearisome, though to many who had followed the affairs of the Universities to which they belonged they would not have been without interest. But, as having a deep regard for the welfare of these institutions, as believing that they were doing their work well and successfully, that any new legislation concerning them should be most cautious, most deliberate, and most careful, he could not, even if without support in this Motion, do otherwise than protest against the hasty and unfortunate course on which Parliament seemed about to enter. He begged, in conclusion, to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment moved,

To leave out all after the word ("that") in order to insert the following words: ("that legislation with reference to the Universities will be premature unless preceded by an inquiry into the working of the changes effected as to the state, studies, and discipline of those Universities by the legislation of 1854 and 1856.")—(The Lord Colchester.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he was one of those who last year was not convinced by the arguments of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Colchester) of the necessity of hanging up the question of University Reform indefinitely for the purpose of once more instituting a large and formal investigation into the working of the Oxford and Cambridge University system; and he still remained unconvinced. The noble Lord had spoken with respect to the famous Oxford University Commission which sat to consider this question some 23 years ago; and, indeed, it was impossible to exaggerate its importance. The result of their investigation had been to throw a flood of light upon the whole question, which had not lost its effect down to the present time. The noble Lord had said truly that that inquiry, and the information it had produced, had been used for the purpose of bringing about the most beneficial, but, at the same time, the most radical, changes in the Oxford system. That was true enough; but it must not be forgotten that what it was sought to accomplish by means of the present Bill was a very much smaller and less ambitious result. The information which was then obtained could be very easily supplemented by the Commissioners to be appointed under this Bill, and a great deal of the further information sought would be found in the minds of the Commissioners themselves. The principal reason the noble Lord had given for asking for further investigation was his fear as to the future existence of College fellowships. For his own part, he had never been alarmed on this subject since he had first heard the statement of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury), in spite of his denunciation of what he termed "idle fellowships." He had himself the utmost confidence in the powers of the Commission to be appointed under this Bill to resist any excessive or revolutionary changes; and indeed his fears took a direction contrary to those of the noble Lord on this point. He believed that a fund of prudence and a power of resistance would be found in some of the distinguished Members of the Commission which might completely relieve their minds of all fear on this subject. With regard to the Bill itself, it had, in his opinion, lost nothing by the delay of a year. On the whole, it was now a better considered measure than it was then. It had been improved on some points on which he himself had desired to see a change made; and the noble Marquess opposite had evidently paid every attention to the criticisms which were offered last year by noble Lords on both sides of the House. He was glad to see that Clause 11 provided that the Commissioners should not sanction schemes affecting any one College until they had devised a plan for dealing with the whole University. The clause relating to the principle upon which College contributions should be assessed was also a wise one, and he hoped that it would prevent such dangers arising as were apprehended last year. He thought that the Commissioners should carefully ascertain the requirements of the Universities, and be empowered then to decide the proportions in which each of the Colleges should subscribe to the common fund for carrying out the objects the Universities were founded to achieve. Further, he thought that common funds should be established in each University for the various useful educational purposes in connection with learning and research; and he therefore supported the Bill as far as that was concerned. His objections to the Bill were based not so much upon what it proposed to do as to what it would leave undone. His desire was to see such important problems solved as those which the noble Lord had mentioned, especially—for these were the chief omissions—as to the constitution of Convocation and Congregation, which at Oxford constituted the Legislative Body—and to the question of clerical fellowships. He hoped this last question would be discussed in the progress of the Bill. He agreed in the main with the terms of the Preamble of the Bill—that it is expedient that provision should be made for enabling or compelling the Colleges to contribute more largely to University purposes. With the qualifications he had mentioned, he was therefore ready to support the Bill.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE said, he was most anxious that the Bill should be passed this Session—and that, he hoped, might be regarded as a matter of certainty. Although he was not prepared to express his approval of the measure in every particular, either as to what it did or what it did not do, yet he thought that the Universities would have just cause of complaint if they were kept longer in suspense; and he also desired it to pass because he anticipated that the result of the measure would be greatly to increase the usefulness of the Universities. Since the passing of the Acts 20 years ago there had been great activity at both Universities, and considerable efforts had been made to render their teaching wider and larger, and to include a greater range of subjects. He spoke principally of Cambridge, though he believed his observations applied as well to Oxford, and he thought that both Universities would do much more if there were funds applicable for their purposes. The Colleges were the only source from which such funds could be supplied; and the Colleges themselves—or, at least, the greater part of them—acknowledged the claim the Universities had upon them, and were perfectly willing to contribute. He, for one, felt that the Universities urgently required additional funds; and thinking that this Bill provided the proper sources from which they would be derived, he could not but hope that the Bill would pass. He would give it his cordial approval and assent. As to the Amendment of the noble Lord (Lord Colchester), he did not agree him that there should be any further inquiry or that any was required. The Parliament proceeded to legislate. There was a larger amount of information already collected than most persons were aware of, and whatever nation might be got to remain working of the Bill in the hands of the members themselves.

CAMPERDOWN also made a further inquiry was made of legislation. He must be allowed to say that the Government ought to acknowledge and impartiality with the Marquess in charge of the Bill. He considered the many objections involved in it. The point on which he desired to dwell was the noble Marquess. At the Bill proposed to the House and Colleges in a difficult position he hoped the noble Marquess would explain the reason why it was adopted.

MIDDLETON said, that the Bill of last Session.

It had fallen from his hands who had moved the Bill. He was quite agreed; but he thought that there should be any further investigation, before it was clear that everything was carried out the proper manner. Under this Bill the members would not be called upon to give up their property without being told for going to give up their property. It was a fact would, he believed, be a great deal of the property might otherwise have been obtained from those Colleges which were controlled by the Commissioners for the prosecution of the Bill and as proper sources of revenue. Besides, the Bill was more symmetrical in its provisions than the former one. Its objects were more clearly defined and the means to achieve those objects were more clearly set forth. He was not at too great partiality for the University system. He was with extreme alarm any change, still more to destroy, the excellence of the present system, and he was anxious to see the safeguards embodied in the Bill now under consideration. As the Bill was infinitely better than the one of last year, and as it had already been fully considered in "another place," he hoped it would be passed into law this Session.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he did not think it was necessary for him to reply to the interesting speech of his noble Friend below the Gangway (Lord Colchester), because every subsequent speaker had expressed himself satisfied with the information already obtained on the subject; and, generally, their Lordships appeared to be of opinion that they ought not for the sake of any addition to their already abundant knowledge expose the Universities to the great evil and expense of further delay. The truth was that whatever they did—whatever conclusion they arrived at, they could not within that building pass a measure wholly adapted to the Universities. That must be done within the Universities themselves—what they must do was to entrust large powers, with proper safeguards, to the Commissioners, and confide to them the subsidiary inquiries which might be necessary. Of this he was assured—that no inquiry their Lordships' House could order would be more satisfactory than that which his noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Selborne) would doubtless think it his duty to make. In reference to what his noble Friend who had just spoken (Viscount Middleton) had said, he must, for his own part, disclaim having any animosity to the College system, and he declined to identify the non-resident Fellows with that system. All the advantages obtained from the Colleges were not conferred by the non-resident Fellows; but they involved a thorny subject, and an odium almost equal to the odium theologicum was approached when it was mentioned, and he had somewhat avoided it in re-introducing the Bill this Session. There was one fact he desired to recommend to his noble Friend. If he (the Marquess of Salisbury) was on the Commission, and found himself in that impossible condition of having his own way, a larger change would, he thought, be made in the case of non-resident Fellows than was at all likely to come into effect from this Bill. But he was not on the Commission, and had not the slightest influence on those who were on it. The character and attainments of its members were well known, and he did not think the most Conservative among their Lordships had any reason to fear the adoption of revolutionary measures. As to the College system, he would only say that no men were more intensely orthodox than those who formed the Commission. He felt, therefore, that the fears of his noble Friend had no strong foundation. For his part, he did not think that the system of non-resident Fellows was destined to perpetual duration; he believed it impossible to defend it logically, but that was no necessary reason why it should be abolished at once. If they were to abolish everything, the existence of which could not be logically defended, they would have a good deal to do in the way of re-construction. He did not think that they were prepared to get rid of the system referred to at present. They would be only willing to dispense with it as far as it might be necessary to secure funds for the Universities as places of education. Then as to the constitution of the Universities—that, too, was a thorny subject. He quite agreed that as to what should form a proper constitution of the Universities there might be differences of opinion; but he was not prepared to hand over the country clergy connected with the Universities to the condemnation of noble Lords opposite. He looked upon the country clergy as the fly-wheel of the University machine. The noble Lord the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Lord Carlingford) had made use of the phrase “the real University.” That he (the Marquess of Salisbury) thought was a phrase which he once heard from the lips of Mr. Bright in reference to the occasion when the abolition of the Paper Duties was rejected by that House. The measure, he said, was lost by 29, by those who had been brought up to vote, but it had been carried by “the real House of Lords.” He suspected that Mr. Bright was about as right in speaking of the Peers who ordinarily worked the machinery of the House of Lords as the “real” House of Lords as the noble Lord had been right in saying that those who ordinarily worked the academical system were entitled to the name of the “real University.” The truth was that the outside Members—those who formed what might be called the stragglers of any Legislative Body—were useful for the purpose he had just indicated—they prevented legislation from falling into the hands of a clique, or being dominated by a faction, and they gave to its aims a certain degree of steadiness and persistency. He therefore by no means desired to under-rate their usefulness. There was one little matter to which reference had been made in the course of the debate, and to which he should like to advert—namely, the position of the Schools under the Bill. It had been said that they had had a stronger protection afforded to them than that given to the Colleges under the Bill. But he thought that one-half the amount of protection given to the Colleges had been overlooked. They were entitled to place upon the Commission three of their Members whenever the statutes which referred to them were under discussion. The Schools did not and could not enjoy the same privilege, because there was no Governing Body of the character which enabled the Colleges to be represented, and it was necessary to find some other form of protection. The Government, therefore, fell back upon the precedent of 1854, which affected the Schools and Colleges alike. The appearance of the Schools in the Bill was but subsidiary, and it was not likely to alter their status; but the protection given to them would relieve them from any fears which they might entertain. He had now only to express, in conclusion, his gratification at the general goodwill with which the Bill had been received, and the prospect which that goodwill afforded that the measure would pass into law during the present Session.

Then the original Motion was agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he understood from the draftsman that there were many alterations which it would be necessary to make, and he proposed to go into Committee pro forma on Thursday in order that the Bill might be re-printed. He should then ask their Lordships to go into Committee on the Bill on Thursday week, July 12.

Bill committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

PERSIA AND TURKEY—THE BOUNDARY.—QUESTION.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs for information as to the boundary line between Turkey and Persia which was laid down by scientific officers under the auspices of the British Government some years ago; whether it has been formally agreed to; and, if not, for what reason it has not been called into operation? The noble Earl said that, although the Question stood in his own name, he had been requested to place it upon the Paper by his noble Friend (Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe), whose authority upon the Eastern Question was supreme, and whose interest in what was going on was undiminished by the weight of 90 years. He believed that there would be no difficulty on the part of the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) in answering the Question—although he did not know whether the reply might be altogether satisfactory to the interests concerned. He understood from his noble Friend (Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe) that the advance of the Russian forces into Asia Minor and their approach to the Persian frontier, gave more than usual interest to the diplomatic relations between Persia and Turkey. War between those two countries was averted many years ago by the joint mediation of England and Russia. The immediate cause of quarrel was a disputed frontier. The negotiation which ensued terminated in a Treaty. But fresh differences arose on drawing the boundary line. It was then agreed that a map of the whole frontier country should be made on scientific principles with the view of removing all uncertainty from the points in dispute. Much time was required for this operation; but finally all difficulties were overcome by the skill and perseverance of agents employed by the mediating Powers, and the result was a map from which no appeal could reasonably be made. On an average breadth of about 50 miles, with a length of more than 700, it presented the local details of the whole region traversed by the boundary line. It was, however, desirable to know from Her Majesty's Government whether the Turko-Persian boundary had ever been laid down in a settled and binding form in conformity with the map or even otherwise; and, if not, for what reasons the omission had been allowed to occur?

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, as my noble Friend anticipates, I shall have no difficulty in giving him an Answer to the Question he has put to me. The best way of doing so is by laying before your Lordships in the fewest possible words a recapitulation of what has passed in connection with this matter. There is a slight verbal inaccuracy in the statement implied in the Question my noble Friend has put to me. It is not correct to say that any boundary line has been laid down by scientific officers under the auspices of the British Government. What has happened was this—As long ago as the year 1843 the British and Russian Governments engaged to use their good offices in bringing about a settlement of the boundary dispute which existed between Persia and Turkey, and which at that time had very nearly led to war. In May, 1847, a Treaty was signed at Erzeroum between the Persian and Turkish Governments. The effect was to provide for the appointment by those two Governments of Commissioners by whom the boundary was to be defined. We, the British Government, were not parties to that Treaty, although we had a good deal to do with its conclusion. We agreed with the Russian Government to give our assistance in settling the boundaries, and we engaged to act as mediators in case of any dispute. In pursuance of that understanding, after the Treaty was concluded, English and Russian officers were employed in preparing maps of the country through which the boundary line had to pass. There were delays and difficulties of various kinds, with the cause of which I am not well acquainted; but the result was that those maps were not completed until 1869. In that year they were handed in. A Convention was then signed between Persia and Turkey, by which it was agreed to maintain the status quo pending the final settlement of the boundary. The arrangement at that time stood as follows:—The mediating Powers, England and Russia, agreed that the boundary line ought to pass within the limits of the map so prepared. It included a considerable extent of country, but the fixing of the precise boundary itself was not undertaken by the English and Russian officers—that was left to the Turkish and Persian Governments to settle between them. But a proposal was added by the two mediating Powers that if any difference should arise the point in dispute should be referred to them for their joint decision. In January, 1875, we received for the first time an official intimation that the Turkish and Persian Governments had found themselves unable to agree upon a boundary line. Thereupon Sir Arnold Kemball was appointed on behalf of the British Government, and a Russian delegate was appointed by his own Government, to attend a Conference which was to be held on the subject. The Commissioners met and transacted some business; but the difference of opinion between the two principal parties concerned was such that no understanding was arrived at; and I am sorry to say that from that time to the present it has not been found possible to induce them either to agree between themselves to settle a boundary line or to refer the question to the decision of any other Power. Neither side—I say it with all impartiality—has shown the slightest disposition to make any concession. They both seem to have acted upon the Oriental principle of doing nothing to-day which it is possible to put off—I will not say till to-morrow, but till next month or next year. Since the outbreak of the war the question has necessarily been hung up. The Russian Commissioner has been recalled, and Sir Arnold Kemball, as your Lordships are aware, is employed upon other duties. But although there have been excessive and vexatious delays, and though I am bound to say neither party has shown any great willingness to come to an understanding, still the negotiation is not broken off—only suspended—and there is no reason why it should not be resumed when a favourable opportunity presents itself. I can assure my noble Friend and your Lordships that Her Majesty's Government are fully aware of the extreme importance of preventing the outbreak of war between Persia and Turkey, and that they will lose no available opportunity of endeavouring to avert such a public misfortune.

QUESTIONS.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—REFLECTIONS ON THIS HOUSE.

NOTICE.

MR. BLAKE rose to give Notice that on Thursday he would ask the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), Whether, at a public meeting, held in London on Saturday, April 21, in speaking of the obstructive conduct of himself and the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), he used the words attributed to him in a report which appeared in The Daily Telegraph of April 23—namely,

“ We have only been at the work two months, and they—the English Members—would be glad to be rid of us; but I don't know what state of mind they will be in when the end of the Session comes, nor can they devise a plan to stop us. . . . If we had only ten men we could put a stop to all their work. . . . If we can't meet them in the field and assert our rights with cold steel—”

MR. SPEAKER: Order! The Question which the hon. Member is now giving Notice of putting on a subsequent occasion to the hon. Member for Meath does not relate to any Bill or Motion before the House. According, therefore, to the Rules of the House, it cannot be put.

MR. BLAKE said, that with the indulgence of the House, he would give reasons for the Question, and conclude with a Motion.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member cannot, under cover of a Motion for the Adjournment of the House, do anything which is irregular.

MR. BLAKE: Then I will, on the earliest opportunity, call the attention of the House to the reports of The Times and The Daily Telegraph as a question of Privilege affecting the Members of this House.

STATE OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—THE HALF-PAST TWELVE RULE.

QUESTION.

MR. FORTESCUE HARRISON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, looking to the state of Public Business in this House and the difficulties under which private Members are now contending, he will recommend the House to rescind, for the remainder of the Session, the half-past Twelve Rule?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Her Majesty's Government are continually "looking to the state of Public Business in this House," and looking at the difficulties with which not only "private Members" as they are good enough to denominate themselves, but Members of the Government also, are contending, but I am not at present prepared to make any proposal on the subject. I think, after recent events, it would be proper that we should consider the whole subject, and then, perhaps, I shall be able to answer the Question of the hon. Member.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL.

QUESTION.

THE O'CONOR DON: I wish to offer a few words in explanation before putting a Question I have on the Paper. Hon. Gentlemen will remember that on Thursday the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that the Government intended to take Supply upon every Government day, with some exceptions, including to-day, until they had made some considerable progress, and to take Votes in this order—namely, the Army Estimates, the English and Scotch Education Votes, and the Irish Education Votes. On the latter I have a Motion which is likely to raise a discussion of some length and of considerable interest in Ireland. On Thursday I informed the right hon. Gentleman that if he was in a position to tell us that the Government could give a day for the discussion of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) at some reasonable period, I would not bring on my Motion on going into Committee of Supply. I made that offer with the desire not of obstructing Business, but rather expediting it, and assisting the Government to get through the work of the Session. On Friday the right hon. Gentleman held out some hopes that a day might be given. Since then—yesterday—the Army Estimates were brought forward, and notwithstanding what occurred this morning, I am justified in saying that considerable and substantial progress was made with them. If the Estimates were taken in the ordinary course, and no unusual obstruction were offered to them, we might naturally expect that the Irish Education Votes would be reached next week. I have been asked by several hon. Members whether I shall go on with my Motion or not. It would be a great convenience to myself and to several hon. Members, and to the House, to know whether that Motion is to be proceeded with or not; and I am unable to give an answer or to decide what course I will take with regard to my Motion, until I know what the Government says with regard to giving a day for the discussion of the University Bill. And I ask the question now, and not as a matter of favour to the Irish Representatives, but with the view of expediting Public Business. Having explained the object of my Question, I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will state more definitely than he has hitherto done whether the Government can give a day for the discussion of the Irish University Education Bill; and, if so, whether it is likely that such day can be given before the end of the present month?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. Member for Roscommon has accurately described what passed, but he has slightly misunderstood what I said about the Supply. I stated that the first business of the Government would be Supply in the order in which the hon. Gentleman mentions it, and I said we proposed in the present week to give every day at our disposal, except this morning, which was appropriated for another purpose, to discussions in Supply. I did not say that all other Government business would be laid aside till we got through Supply, because there are two Bills which it is important for us to proceed with—namely, the Indian Loan Bill and the South Africa Bill; and although I adhere to the arrangement as to going on with Supply every day this week, I cannot bind myself to go on with it thereafter, to the exclusion of those Bills. With regard to the subject of Irish University Education, I understand the Question in this way—the hon. Gentleman and others look forward to a discussion upon it in connection with the Irish Education Estimates; but I am informed that it would be more convenient to Irish Members generally if the discussion arose, not on the Education Estimates, but on the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt). To that arrangement the Government are perfectly prepared to accede, with a view to convenience, but it must be on the understanding that we are not to have the discussion twice over; and what I understood to be the intention with which we made the offer was this—if the Estimates pass without the discussion being raised on the University question, we would provide a day as speedily as possible afterwards for the discussion of the Irish University Bill. That is an arrangement we are prepared to adhere to; but, of course, if the question should be raised on the Motion of the hon. Member for Roscommon, our engagement to find a day for the discussion of the Bill must be considered over. We are not bound by it. The hon. Member asks whether it is likely that a day can be given before the end of the present month. I must refer the hon. Gentlemen to some of the hon. Members who sit near him. We are perfectly unable, if matters are to proceed as they have been proceeding, to say on what day anything can be brought on. We are anxious to bring the subject forward as soon as possible; but Notice shall be given as soon as we find ourselves in a position to do so.

THE COLORADO BEETLE. QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, now that it is more than probable that the Colorado beetle may reach Ireland, where its depredations would be very injurious, steps will be taken by the Government to give such information as will render the recognition of the insect easy, together with instructions pointing out the best means for its destruction and the places where the deposit of its eggs are most likely to be found?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I fear it is possible that the Colorado beetle may reach Ireland, though I think the hon. Member goes too far in assuming that it is more than probable that such will be the case. However, I quite agree with him as to the serious consequences that would result from any extensive ravages of this insect in Ireland; and I will, after communication with the authorities in Great Britain, see how far his suggestion can be acted upon. But I would point out that to some extent that information has been furnished by the private enterprise of the proprietor of The Farmers' Gazette in Dublin. Two years ago a large coloured engraving of the beetle and information as to its habits were circulated largely among the agriculturists in Ireland owing to the public spirit of that gentleman.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE MEDITERRANEAN FLEET.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I wish to ask a Question, of which I have given the Government private Notice, Whether the Mediterranean Fleet, which we have been informed has left the Piræus, has been ordered to proceed to Besika Bay?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, Sir; it is quite true.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—NOTICE.

MR. PULESTON gave Notice that he would move on Thursday—

“That in Committee of the Whole House no Member have power to move more than once either that the Chairman do report Progress, or that the Chairman leave the Chair, and that no Member who has made one of those Motions have power to move the other in the same Committee.”

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—LATE SITTINGS.—NOTICE.

MR. WHALLEY: I beg to give Notice that on Thursday I shall move—

“That the practice of commencing business in this House at hours varying on each day, and continuing its sittings up to indefinite and unseasonable hours of the night and morning is at variance with experience as to the proper mode of transacting public business, and alike inconsistent with the convenience of Members and the discharge of the duties of this House," and I beg now, Sir, to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member cannot interpose in the ordinary Business of the House. I was about to call upon the Clerk to read the Orders of the Day, which is the Business laid down by this House for itself. The Clerk will now proceed to read the Orders of the Day.

MR. WHALLEY again endeavoured to interpose, but the Clerk called the first Order of the Day.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) (re-committed) BILL —[BILL 160.]

(Mr. Richard Smyth, The O'Connor Don, Mr. Charles Lewis, Mr. James Corry, Mr. William Johnston, Mr. Dease, Mr. Dickson, Mr. Redmond.)

COMMITTEE ON RE-COMMITMENT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [27th June], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (for Committee on the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill); and which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is not expedient that the provisions of this Bill should be extended to the whole of Ireland,"—(Mr. Murphy.)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. RICHARD SMYTH was proceeding to address the Committee, when—

THE O'DONOGHUE rose to a point of Order. He wished to ask the Speaker whether the hon. Member for Londonderry, having already addressed the House, it was competent for him to speak again in the same debate; certainly he had spoken, though briefly, when moving the Order for proceeding with the consideration of the Bill in Committee.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Londonderry has not spoken on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Murphy), and he is therefore quite in Order.

MR. RICHARD SMYTH: I rise to address the House for a few minutes at great disadvantage, for I feel that whilst time in the long run is fighting on the side of this Bill, the sand-glass of to-day is exhausting itself at my expense, and every moment I occupy I am giving comfort to my opponents. But, as it has been formally announced that persistent talk is to do for the Bill a work which fair argument cannot do, I may as well appropriate to myself a few minutes of the time upon which an unreasoning set has been made. I have often during my life heard of the tyranny of majorities; but I had to come into the House of Commons to learn what is implied in the tyranny of minorities. Sir, I perceive that there is a determination that minorities shall dictate to this House, and that the will alike of the country and of this House shall be thwarted and defied by a combination of Members, who, worsted in argument and in division, betake themselves to the tactics of despair, and pursue a course which, if persevered in much longer, will reduce Parliamentary government to an absurdity. My hon. Friend the Member for Cork, in that admirable speech which he delivered on Wednesday—admirable for its purpose, because it was length that was required—was particularly copious in statistics; and so profound was the impression produced by his figures that the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) was instantaneously converted by them, according to his own confession. I hazard the opinion that this is the first instance in the history of the English Parliament in which an experienced and venerable English statesman was suddenly converted from the error of his ways by a sheet of police statistics read by an Irishman for the purpose of talking out a Bill. Having so flexible a mind as that of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield to deal with, I should not wonder if he will be converted back again before this debate closes. I am sure, if statistics will do it, we have the means ready at our hand. But was the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield ever an advocate for Sunday closing? He made a speech on the 12th of July last year against the second reading of the Bill, and read a lecture, first to the Government, and next to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), for giving any countenance to the measure; and yet on Wednesday he got up and told us that he had been convinced by the statistics of the hon. Member for Cork. The hon. and learned Member bases his claim to have been considered friendly to the Bill on Wednesday morning last by the circumstance that he voted for the postponement of the Standing Orders that the Sunday Closing Bill might come on for discussion. Yes, he did so; and I have been obliged to rebuke some suspicious people for saying that the hon. and learned Gentleman gave that vote because he had come down to the House to make a speech against the Bill, and could not have made it all if the Orders of the Day had not been postponed. I have had to defend the hon. and learned Member against these imputations, and it was about as difficult a task as I ever undertook. Sir, the hon. and learned Member never was, I believe, an advocate for Sunday closing in the whole course of his life; and the idea that was in his mind on Wednesday that he had been suddenly convinced and converted by the Irish logarithmic tables of the hon. Member for Cork, I must regard as nothing else than a case of political self-delusion. And what was the nature of these statistics? Why, it is found that there are fewer arrests for drunkenness on Sundays in Ireland than on other days of the week, Saturday in particular; and he draws the inference from this that there is less drinking on Sundays than on other days. My hon. Friend the Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) pertinently reminded the House that there are fewer hours for getting drunk on Sundays, only one-half the usual number. But I can assign additional reasons for the difference. We had it in evidence before the Select Committee that the persons arrested are generally the habitual drunkards, and as they are captured in large numbers on Saturday night, they are already in the lock-up on Sunday. Besides, it was stated to us that no one is arrested for merely getting drunk. He must also be disorderly or incapable to subject himself to arrest. We were also told that friends look after drunken friends on Sundays more vigilantly than they do on other days of the week, being more at leisure. We have no means of knowing the exact proportion of young men or young women who escape arrest just because they are able to walk or are in charge of friends, or are not creating disorder in the streets. Sunday is not the habitual drunkard's day, for he is generally in gaol on Saturday night; but it is the day young men and young women, of whom the police take little notice, are exposed to special temptation, and when the seeds are sown which bear fruit in the demoralization of their after-life. Sunday is the tippling day of the young; it is not the day of revel for the drunkards. Honest working men and their wives have frequently expressed to me their wish that this Bill might pass. Why? Because their children frequent the public-houses on Sunday. These police statistics which had such an elevating influence on the mind of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield give us no criterion of the havoc made in the morals of the young during the drinking hours on Sunday. I have not done with the statistics of the hon. Member for Cork. He ventured into another field, and undertook to analyze the votes of Irish Members on this question. He prefaced this part of the subject by an attack upon the officials and members of the Irish Sunday Closing Association. The hon. Gentleman is incapable of saying anything which he does not believe; but, nevertheless, he said things which are not true, and he said other things which he could not know to be true. He asserted that the United Kingdom Alliance supplies funds, I think he said to the amount of £250,000. [Mr. MURPHY: No, no!] Well, at all events, that they were closely connected with the Irish Sunday closing agitators. If that were so, there would be nothing to be ashamed of. But, Sir, if my hon. Friend's memory were a little more impartial in the marshalling of facts, he would not have fallen into a mistake which is only to be expected in blunted minds. This very allegation was made the subject of a searching inquiry by the hon. Member him

mittee, and it was denied, disproved, and solemnly repudiated in every form of language that could be conceived in reply to the hon. Member's own questions. I listened with astonishment as he retailed these unfounded and disproved allegations; and I confess that my wonder was intensified as I contemplated that marvellous versatility of memory whereby he could remember some things so well and forget others so easily. My hon. Friend is scandalized at the selfishness of the officials of the Irish Sunday Closing Association. I am unable to follow the hon. Gentleman into these mysterious regions of human motive; but I will say that the officials of an honourable organization stand before another tribunal than the one to which they are summoned by the hon. Member for Cork, the tribunal of his own judgment. My hon. Friend, from that high region of disinterested patriotism, where he and his Followers breathe the pure air of political life, may well find it difficult to make allowance for human weakness. But I am happy to think that I now address an Assembly of Gentlemen who are willing to take me and my Friends for what we seem to be, and not for what we may be in the baseness of our own hearts. But I am almost forgetting the statistics. Now, for my hon. Friend's analysis of the Irish vote. He impugns the accuracy of the figures published by the Sunday Closing Association. They put forward 59 Members from Ireland as having voted for the Resolution last year, and two as pairing in its favour. My hon. Friend has examined the list, and can only find 51 Irish names in the Division List in favour of my Resolution. I am very sorry that he could not find more. Seventy Irish Members actually voted in the division of the 12th of May, 1876—59 for and 11 against the Motion. These were the 11 of all Ireland. He forgot to tell us anything about the 11; but as, in the course of his speech, he said so frequently that he did not like to detain the House, we must assume that when he made omissions it was simply because he was unwilling to speak longer than two hours and ten minutes. But what is the use of haggling about the Irish vote in 1876? Let us have the Irish vote in 1877. I am not afraid of it, and I challenge the hon. Member for Cork to give up his miserable policy of obstruction, and meet us in fair battle. We can soon end all controversy about the Irish vote—20 minutes will do it. But we have been told that we who support this measure do not represent our constituents. Now, I dare affirm that if there was one thing which an Irish Member is good at it is understanding his constituents; and I believe that some of us—I do not say whether I include or exclude myself—vote for this Bill, not so much because we are fanatical Sunday-closers, as because our constituents expect us to do it. You need not talk to me about knowing Irish opinion. Each Member has enough to do in keeping pace with the opinion of the people who sent him here, without troubling himself about general Irish opinion. I know my own constituents, and I shall answer for no others. Each Member will answer for himself and for those who sent him here in the Division Lobbies; and I do not believe that there is one Member from all Ireland who will go into the Lobby with me knowing that his vote will oust him at the next Election. The House may, therefore, make its mind easy about Irish opinion. The fact is simply this—those constituencies where the publican interest dominates are against the Bill; and whenever that interest or power is inappreciable the constituencies are for it—there is no opinion in Ireland against it but trade opinion, and we deny that trade as trade has anything to do with Sunday. There are 28 counties in Ireland, out of which not a single Petition has come to this House this year against the Bill. We are asked to wait another year and see what a revulsion of opinion will take place. We were asked the same last year and the year before.

Our opponents never are, but always to be, supported by the country. The right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland admitted at the beginning of the Session that he had been affected last year by the prophecies of re-action from the hon. Members for Cork and Dundalk, but that he had come to the conclusion that they were not prophets at all. Ireland will speak with the same voice to-day if she gets the chance as she did on the 12th of May, 1876. I think we have a right to expect some Member of the Government to declare their intention with regard to this question. Are they going to remain passive and allow this minority to override the will of the House of Commons? We had better know the worst at once, that we may shape our course accordingly. I give all fair warning that a talk-out to-day shall not be accepted by me as a final struggle on this Bill. If the minority is in despair, the majority is in earnest. I want to know whether the Government wishes this question settled? It can settle it if it pleases. Before I sit down I must glance for a moment at the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Westmeath (Mr. P. J. Smyth). His patriotism and eloquence are acknowledged in all quarters of this House, and his words have always the weight which attaches by a generous paradox to a man who stands alone. I understood my hon. Friend to speak disparagingly of any attempt made by this Imperial Parliament to govern Ireland according to Irish ideas; for, as this is an Imperial Parliament, it can only take account of Imperial interests, and not allow itself to be swayed by local sentiment. When I heard my hon. Friend laying down these great and even dread principles of Imperial policy, I could not forget that I was receiving instruction from a man who has a theory of his own for breaking up the Imperial Parliament, and who, I suppose, would not be sorry to see Imperial government rendered less tolerable than it is. I have not the least doubt that he gave sound advice from his own point of view; but I am convinced it is most dangerous advice to be accepted by the friends of Imperial government. If local ideas are to be disregarded by this House, it needs no prophet to see that the days of Imperial government on a Constitutional basis will soon be numbered. I submit that taking account of local ideas is an Imperial interest. No Empire ever long survived an attempt to govern all its dependencies by one cast iron code of law. The Roman Empire, so long as it was wise and powerful, accommodated itself to the prejudices and feelings of Provinces and Kingdoms it annexed. When it reduced another and another nation under its sway it respected their local customs, and did not disdain to elevate their gods and demi-gods to niches in its temple. Its Procurators and pro-Consuls were sent to govern African and Asiatic Provinces according to African and Asiatic ideas. The Sanhedrim sat at Jerusalem, it may be a little overawed, but not coerced by the sceptre of the Cæsars; and Corinth was conceded something of its local liberty. It was not until the doctrine of my hon. Friend became a dominant force in the Empire, and local ideas began to be scouted as unworthy of Imperial consideration, that the fabric fell, and out of its ruins new despotisms arose. Sir, let us beware of stretching out the limbs of Ireland until they fill the Procrustean bed of a rigid English policy, for, if we attempt this, we shall at once disable Ireland, and bring a curse and dishonour upon England. Give Ireland her way when it can do you no harm, and, if you cannot attach her people to your sway, you will at least stand out before the civilized world as a Government that did its best to justify and render tolerable its supremacy.

MR. COLLINS said, he had listened with great attention to the able and eloquent speech of his hon. Friend who had just sat down, in the hope that he would have adduced arguments to meet the statistics and the arguments employed by his hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Murphy); but he had listened in vain, for he had failed to discover anything like substantial argument in favour of the Bill. His hon. Friend had accused them of a persistent attempt to talk out the measure and of defying the opinion of the majority of the House. If a small minority of the Representatives of Ireland had endeavoured by such arguments as they could employ to convince the House that this was a measure which was not acceptable to the majority of the people of Ireland, he did not see how they had exposed themselves to the accusations which his hon. Friend had brought against them. Well, the hon. Member in charge of the Bill had called its opponents a little band who were afraid to meet in fair Parliamentary discussion the majority who were the supporters of the Bill. He left the House to judge of the correctness of that statement. He believed that on every occasion on which the subject had been brought forward they had endeavoured fairly and honestly, and so far as was in their power, by argument, to convince the House, and he did not despair of attaining that object. Now, he had had very considerable doubt as to whether he himself would have taken a part in the discussion, until he had felt that it was an obligation incumbent upon every Irish Member who dissented from the view which had been so extensively before the House, to the effect that opinion in Ireland was unanimous in favour of the Bill, to say so. He denied that view altogether, and he was there with his Friends to say that that was not so, and that not only was the opinion of the people of Ireland not unanimous on the subject, but that a majority of all classes was opposed to it. Now, there was no doubt that it was an opposite impression to that conveyed, doubtless unintentionally, that had resulted in a conviction in the minds of hon. Gentlemen and right hon. Gentlemen in the House which had induced them to give their support to the Bill. His desire was to undeceive those hon. Gentlemen who had been misled by those misstatements and misrepresentations. Now, it had been stated in the course of that debate that the minority sustaining the opposition had been led on by personal interests and considerations. For himself he must say that he had no personal interest whatever in the matter, and the only influence he was guided by was that of his own personal conviction that the Bill would be received by the people of Ireland with disfavour, and that it was a measure injurious to the happiness and contentment of the Irish people. He had stated that he himself had no personal interest in the matter, and he hoped, therefore, to be able to approach the subject unbiassed, and to examine the question solely with a view to arriving at a fair and just conclusion. Now, Ireland had a population, in round numbers, of 5,500,000. That population was divided into three classes—the upper, the middle, and the working classes. It was obvious to everybody who knew Ireland that the upper classes formed a very small section of the people. They were composed of the nobility and the landed gentry, and took a very small interest in a question of that character, inasmuch as they were, to a very small extent, influenced by its operation. Then, there was the middle class of the country; and if he might take a standard to arrive at the numerical value and power and influence of that class, he thought he could not do better than to illustrate it by the list of Parliamentary electors. What did he find? Well, he found that this class, as represented, consisted of 53,590 electors in cities and towns, and 173,860 electors in counties, making 227,450 in all. Well, suppose the number were doubled, and all supposed to be in favour of Sunday closing, it left about 5,000,000 persons classed as the working classes who were to be dealt with by the present Bill. Those 5,000,000 were the people they were asked to legislate for and to restrain by Act of Parliament from partaking on Sundays of what had become the necessary of life with the great majority of them. He did not desire to say anything harsh or disrespectful with regard to those who were the supporters of this Bill, as he sympathized to a considerable extent with their object. He had himself endeavoured to advance the cause of temperance, and he could co-operate with them cheerfully up to a certain point; but he maintained that, instead of benefiting the people and the cause of temperance, they were actually promoting the reverse and bringing on a condition of things which everybody who desired the welfare of the Irish people must deplore. Well, what did those gentlemen tell them with respect to that Bill? Why, they told a tale which mocked at the people and challenged the evidences of experience and common sense. They told them that those 5,000,000 people came to them praying them as suppliants to protect them against temptation; that they acknowledged themselves to be weak-minded people, intemperate and incapable of restraint, and that they therefore petitioned the House to close the places where they could get refreshments on Sundays in order to save them from ruin. Was that a likely condition of things? Was there ever such a libel uttered against the independence and free action of a people? Why, everyone who had taken an interest in the social condition of the people must be aware that they were striving every day more and more for freedom from restraint and liberty of action. That was a fact they must at once recognize. They saw it in every turn of life; and yet these were the people who, they were told by the promoters of that Bill, wanted Parliament to restrain and control them, and prevent the exercise of their independent judgment in matters which they believed to conduce to their own comfort and convenience.

Why, let them look at the labour organizations of the country. Let them see the extent to which Friendly Societies, Trades Unions, and Co-operative Associations had spread. What were they to infer from these organizations? Why, that the people were becoming self-reliant; that they understood how to work and to manage for themselves; and he believed that this Bill would be an affront and an insult to the intelligence of the people. What force was there in their arguments in favour of extending the Parliamentary franchise amongst the working classes if they were incapable of self-restraint and could not take care of themselves? He confessed he was unable to reconcile two such discordant principles, and he left the task in the hands of the supporters of the Bill. There was another point which had been alluded to by his hon. Friend, and that was the Petitions which had been presented to the House. The hon. Member dwelt a good deal upon the evidence that was supplied by the Petitions that were presented to the House either for or against the measure. Well, he had taken the trouble to examine some of those Petitions, and what did he find? He thought it would be a fair and reasonable starting-point to commence on the day of the first sitting of the Select Committee on the Bill. That was on the 23rd of February, and down to the 26th of June—the date of the last of the Petitions appearing officially before the House—he found that there were 172 Petitions from Ireland against the Bill, with 73,243 bond fide signatures. On the other hand, he found that there 407 Petitions in favour of the Bill, with but 44,090 signatures. But there was something stranger still, and he should like to submit to the House the manner in which those Petitions were made up. Of the 407 Petitions 103 were from places in England; 146 were from Presbyterian and Methodist congregations—that was to say, from Sabbatarians. Only 158 were from the general public in Ireland, and if he were to assume the proportion that that 158 would bear towards the 407 it would give signatures to the number of 17,000 in favour of the Bill against 73,243 against it. But he had a remarkable list of 126 Petitions presented on one day, the 8th of May, 1876, from English Methodist congregations. In addition to that he had taken a list of Petitions presented last year, and amongst those he found there had been 1,200 Petitions presented by Presbyterian and Methodist congregations, and those were represented to the House as being the opinions, or as representing the opinions, of the people of Ireland on the subject. But he might say that there would have been many more Petitions presented before this year against the Bill, but for the fact that the people did not believe that the Government would consent to so galling a measure, and that there was a feeling that the right hon. Gentleman who was responsible for the government of Ireland was not in favour of the principles of the Bill. The people of Ireland came to learn pretty well and pretty shrewdly what the opinions, to a certain extent at least, of the Government were upon this subject, and they argued with themselves that the Government would never permit a Bill of that extraordinary character, at least in its then shape, to pass the House of Commons. It, however, came to their knowledge that the Chief Secretary for Ireland wished to act justly, to give time for inquiry, and not to endanger the peace of the country by precipitate action and in experimentalizing on the people of Ireland to prepare for a more extensive agitation of a similar measure for England. When the people of Ireland were awakened for the first time to the consciousness that there was a determination to pass the Bill, and that the right hon. Gentleman had agreed to submit it to a Select Committee for examination, what was the result? From the 23rd of February there had been Petitions from bond fide signatories in Ireland, and while 73,243 petitioned against the Bill, he had shown by statistics that those in favour of the Bill amounted to something less than 17,000, and still they were told that the people of Ireland favoured a measure of this kind. It had been shown conclusively that this Bill would rather increase than diminish drunkenness; that it would create an illegal trade; that it would demoralize the people by teaching them how to break the law; and that it would familiarize wives and families with tippling in homes at present free from it. No doubt his hon. Friends desired, as far as they could, to promote the happiness and comfort of the people of Ireland and to elevate their condition; but he took the opportunity of suggesting to those Gentlemen that their object would be better accomplished if they endeavoured to elevate the condition of the people by educating them. It was not the way to elevate the people of a country by passing restrictive and coercive measures. They all knew the character of the Irish people. Treat them kindly, and almost anything could be done with them. Subject them to restriction and coercion, and they knew their character. On Sunday, at present, there was only one means of enjoyment which the lower classes could have recourse to. He did not contend that it was one which, if other facilities were provided, would be either a desirable or a suitable one. But, at the same time, it must be remembered that in an agricultural country like Ireland these people came, in many cases, a considerable distance to their places of worship on Sundays. There was only one place to which they had recourse, and from that they would now be driven ruthlessly into the streets without a door open to receive them or a friend to give them welcome. The amount of drinking on Sundays was not more than one-half what it was on Saturdays, although it was the holiday of the working classes and the day when they were free to meet their friends and enjoy themselves. It was not necessary for him to dwell upon the fact that even in the places where Sunday closing was introduced it had rather increased than diminished drunkenness, and it seemed to him that if hon. Gentlemen would turn their attention to other means of ameliorating the condition of the working classes, by opening museums, picture galleries, and public gardens on Sundays, they would find ample field for their labour and exertions. He hoped the supporters of the Bill would assent to such a modification of its provisions as would considerably relax their rigid and severe character, and render the Bill acceptable to the people of Ireland.

Mr. A. MOORE took it for granted that the majority of the people of Ireland were in favour of the measure. Nothing could be more unreasonable than the minority. They came to the House four years after the question was first agitated, and asked them to consider the views of the people, as if they had not been before them for the last four years. Was it not a test question at the General Election? Seven elections had been held in Ireland since then, and in every case a supporter of the Bill had been elected, and in four places opponents were replaced by promoters. Again, the Bill was carried by an overwhelming majority on its second reading; and were they to be told that all these resources and all these names, which implied so much wealth and influence, had not met in the interests of the licensed victuallers? Were they to be told that these names, that influence, and that power were not able to get up one or two meetings against the Bill? He had been told that only county Members were in favour of the Bill. He represented a borough, and he honestly believed it was the wish of his constituents that the Bill should pass. He had received from a constituency of 10,000 people a Petition in favour of the Bill signed by 2,700; and, deducting the children and those incapable of signing, that pretty well gave them every available man in the town. In the county of Tipperary some of the police districts were in the Roman Catholic diocese of Waterford and some in the archdiocese of Cashel, and in the latter drinking was prohibited by ecclesiastical authority on Sunday. Taking three Sundays in the latter diocese they found the convictions for drunkenness on those days were nil, five and three, as against 113, 57, and 46 in the other three districts. The principle of the Bill was likely to prove equally successful elsewhere when backed up by the civil power. He hoped that hon. Members would not persist in opposing the Bill inordinately, as it might result in the privileges of minorities having to be considered.

MR. GOULDING said, that the hon. Member for Kinsale (Mr. Collins) had told them that the Bill was for one class of persons. He denied that altogether. The Bill was asked for by the people of Ireland. Their ministers, and particularly the Bishops, of all denominations, had asked for the Bill, and the people themselves had asked for it, and he believed it would be a more useful measure to Ireland than any that had been passed for a long time. They were told of the danger of young children being brought under the influence of drink. He denied that, as children, if they drank at all, could drink with their parents when they were out. If that were class legislation, why did not the Irish people come forward at public meetings and protest against it?

MR. S. MOORE said, he had formerly opposed the Bill because, like many others, he considered it an arbitrary measure, not likely to lessen drinking, and he thought most certainly would increase the illicit sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays. In opposing it, he had been in the minority of Irish Members and of the House, and though he held very strongly that the rights of the minority should be at least expressed, or have the power given to them of a full expression, he thought that a measure, seemingly of such importance, that from a private Bill it was nearly magnified into a Government measure. The small minority should bow to the whole of the majority of the House. The voice of his own country had spoken in favour of the Bill, or of a modified measure, and those of his constituents who were opposed to it had remained almost silent. He would not vote against the second reading of the Bill, but would earnestly ask the promoters of it to meet its opponents half way. He asked them not to hold out for "all or nothing," but to give its opponents, who, like himself, had no interest in the liquor traffic, credit for having equally with themselves the good of Ireland at heart. He would remind them that even in legislation a little loaf was better than no bread; and they must not forget, in pleading for restriction on behalf of the thirsty few, what were the requirements of the many who did not get tipsy on Sunday. He merely wished to ask, not for the freedom of excessive drinking, but for that liberty of legitimate thought and action which hon. Members opposite strongly professed to seek and support, and at which he thought this Bill would aim a blow, should its promoters unfortunately not concede what little was asked of them. He need hardly remind them that but little opposition would suffice at this period of the Session to bar the progress of the Bill and to prevent the attainment of the object which they all alike had in view, which was simply to ameliorate the moral and social condition of their countrymen; and he did not think that would be done by a measure which seemed to him, to a great extent at any rate, a measure of coercion.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY : I said last year that although I did not approve of the principles which lie at the root of this Bill, yet, as it was a social question, on which the people of Ireland had a right to think for themselves, if I found there was no strong feeling against the Bill, I would not vote against it this year. Now, looking back to the expressions of opinion which have been given during the past year, I feel bound to admit that, as regards the great body of the country—as regards the rural districts—I have come very much to the same conclusion as the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. S. Moore). I have not seen any strong, strenuous expression of opinion from the rural districts against the Bill. I have seen the continuance of the same feeling which previously existed in the rural districts, as far as we are able to judge, by the ordinary expressions of opinion, in its favour; and bowing to that opinion, I do not intend this year to go into the Lobby against the Bill, provided that I see that the Bill will be presented to the country with such modifications as are, in my opinion, necessary for its safe enactment and enforcement throughout the country. Except in measures connected with temperance, Parties in this House are always ready to make concessions. The doctrine and practice of mutual concession experience has taught us to be absolutely necessary, and it is only when we come to deal with Sunday closers and Permissive Bill Gentlemen that we find that doctrine cast to the winds. Now, we had evidence before the Committee with reference to the applicability of this measure to certain Irish towns—Dublin, Cork, Waterford, and Limerick; and, in the opinion of the majority of the civic representatives, the Bill is not applicable to these towns. The vast preponderance of the evidence of officials, magistrates, and others, having a special knowledge of the large towns was that this was a dangerous experiment to try in large communities. It is much wiser first to try it in small communities, and then afterwards, if it succeeds, apply it gradually to the larger ones. But when we came to vote on the Committee, the supporters of Sunday closing defeated us by a majority of 1, the Chief Secretary remaining without recording his vote in the Chair. That is the position in which the question now stands, and I am speaking here for my constituents; and I am bound to be cautious in forcing any such measure on them, and to see that the experiment is tried fairly, and to give due weight to the evidence of those who come from my town. I am bound to do what I can to insist that this measure shall not be applied to my town, amongst others, too rapidly and injudiciously. Hon. Members get up and make statements, and we are told that this is a test question. When I stood for the City of Limerick, not one word was said to me about Sunday closing, although I introduced the subject, and I said I regarded coercive measures like this as dangerous, and I would oppose it. It is stated that four out of seven by-elections have resulted in favour of Sunday closing; but is four to three anything like the preponderance of Irish opinion about which we hear so much? The hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore) has spoken of the working man, and has said that never, except on one occasion, had he heard amongst them any disapproval of the Bill. I say that never, on any one occasion, when I have spoken to the working men in my city, have I heard them express approval of it. I have heard grievances dilated upon; I have heard that it was a hardship in Limerick that the club should be open for the county gentleman and wealthy citizen, while the public-houses were closed to the poor man, and I have heard murmurs of discontent at class legislation. Let me warn the House that if they give strength to the idea of class legislation by going on with measures of this character, they will increase their difficulties enormously. We hear a good deal about the support of the Clergy. Yes, I know you have the Protestant Dissenting Clergy all over the country in favour of the Bill; but how about the Catholic Clergy? I believe there are 3,000 or 4,000 Catholic Clergy in Ireland, and only 877 have signed the Memorial in favour of the Bill. I believe that many of the best friends of temperance would be perfectly willing to accept a modified measure to advance the cause, and they are by no means anxious that it should be forced upon those localities where the public feeling is against it. It is brought forward as an argument that Sunday closing exists in Tipperary and in Wexford; but surely the mere fact that the Catholic Clergy have such power as to have induced that state of things voluntarily is the very best argument against any legal enactment on Sunday closing. In Limerick we have a Protestant Bishop and a Catholic Bishop, and I am certain if those right rev. gentlemen joined together and appealed to the people and the publican to close on Sundays, or a part of the day, their influence would be amply powerful enough to effect that object without insidiously adopting legal means to effect a moral purpose. The hon. Member for Clonmel spoke of the advantage of having the aid of the civil power given to the spiritual power. Now he is a Catholic, like myself, and I should like to know what he means. This is a very delicate subject to speak upon; but I feel it so strongly, looking back to the past history of the Catholic Church, that I should be untrue to my convictions and false to my duty if I did not say this—The Catholic Church has existed in Ireland under very great difficulties; but notwithstanding the opposition of the law, and every encouragement being given to the people to resist her, she has achieved in the teeth of those difficulties greater moral victories than in any other country in the world. With this history to look back upon, will any Catholic Member come down from the high pinnacle which the Catholic Church occupies in Ireland and ask for the aid of the law? For my part, I will never do it. I believe in the vitality and power of the Catholic Church, and as long as I am a Catholic I shall never vote for calling in the power of the law to teach her morals. The promoters of this Bill make a great mistake. They seem to treat human beings, not as human beings, but as dogs to be muzzled. ["No!"] They never try to elevate their tastes, they never try to create a thirst for something else besides drink—a taste for enjoyment, for literature, for education. ["Oh, oh!"] They have not hitherto done so. The hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) says they are the very people who have done so; but I can only say that if half the money which has been spent in agitating this question had been spent in education, in bringing the people together, in opening club-houses, and in providing rational enjoyment for the people, they would have done far more towards reaching the goal to which they fancy they are tending. You say this thing works well in Scotland, and why should it not in Ireland? There is this great difference—Scotland is a country where the people believe that the Sabbath is broken by keeping open a public-house on Sunday, and they regard it as a sin. Therefore, because the Scotch are rigid Sabbatarians, they closed the public-houses. If anyone doubts that view of the matter let them try to restrict the hours of drinking in Scotland on any other day but Sunday. There are some supporters of Sunday closing in Ireland with whom I have always found it impossible to reason; but during the sittings of the Committee I could not help observing, when the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. R. Smyth) was giving his hostile votes, a certain reluctance and an apparent desire for moderation, and I fear we did not get the full benefit of his own judgment on the question. I may say the same of the hon. and learned Member for Louth, who betrayed a disposition to spare the large towns; but he, like the hon. Member for Londonderry, was under the influence of uncompromising advocates of the Bill, which prevented him from extending the hand of moderation and reconciliation to us. Then there is the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). He is the great leader of temperance in this House, and what manner of man is he? He is a man of great ability, he is a man of an extremely agreeable style of eloquence, great geniality and benevolence; but I do not think I transgress the Rules of the House if I say he is not a man to whose opinions or to whose dicta we would entrust any great social subject in this House. I gather that from the tone in which his speeches on the Permissive Bill and other matters are received here. There is always supposed to be a vein of humour underlying those speeches, and there is a dormant suspicion on both sides of the House that the hon. Baronet, unconsciously almost, does not mean to press to extremes what he says on this subject. Well, then, what is your form of majority but a majority which consists of men who have no particular opinion on the subject? It consists of Englishmen who would be opposed to such a measure in their own country; but as the people of Ireland are strongly in its favour, they would, therefore, support it. If they believe that, I quite agree with them in taking that course; but to the rank and file of Sunday closing Gentlemen I would say this—"Do as you please with the rural districts." ["No!"] Well, then, if my friends, the anti-Sunday closers, will excuse me for having made the mistake, I would say—"Do what the people in the rural districts appear to desire with regard to the rural districts; but when you come to deal with the large towns, pause before you apply to them that which the evidence which we had before the Committee shows they do not desire." I have only one word to say in conclusion. The opponents of this Bill are sometimes charged with obstruction. Now, the promoters of this Bill are, in my opinion, chargeable and answerable for any obstruction which takes place with regard to this measure. ["No, no!"] I trust the length to which I have spoken will not, at any rate, lay me open to the charge of obstruction. If it does, I can assure the House that it is not so intended. Those who advocate the Bill in its entirety decline to accept anything but the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill. As I have before remarked, it is only when you come to deal with the Sunday closing question, that the canon of the Constitution for gradual progress is set at naught and defied. They carry on an aggressive warfare which is unnecessary in this House and unusual. I wait with some interest to hear what are the views of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the important questions which were considered by the Committee. With regard to the rural districts, I bow to their decision; but as to the civic districts, let me press upon the House and upon the Government that harsh and decisive legislation would be extremely dangerous.

MR. SULLIVAN said, there were some 13 or 14 Irish Members who were determined to make up in the length of their speeches for the fewness of their numbers on this question. He did not include in that imputation his hon. Friend who had just sat down, and who had never to his recollection occupied a moment of the time of that House without making some contribution which was useful and valuable. But what was the task which was set to themselves by this handful of Irish Members? It was to choke upon the floor of that House the voice of their own country. ["No, no!"] He would prove the truth of the statement before he sat down. He asked those hon. Members behind him how would they ascertain the voice of Ireland for the purposes of legislation? They had talked by the hour in that House; but had any one of them grappled with this simple proposition? What tests did they propose to apply before Parliament should legislate upon this Irish matter? Would anyone of them tell the House that he had taken the pains to ascertain Irish sentiment upon this question which the Sunday closers had taken? Why, they (the Irish Sunday closers) held the votes of the majority of Members in that House. But, said those 13 hon. Gentlemen who were against them—"The Irish Members have not always read Irish feelings." It was true there were men there voting in the minority who disregarded the will of their constituents which had been expressed and conveyed to them. Well, he admitted that they could not always represent the feelings of their constituents; but if they did not take the votes of the majority of the Irish Members, how else in any Constitutional country in the world was public feeling to be ascertained? Would they take it by the Press of the country—by public meetings in the country—by canvassers from door to door? He searched from St. Petersburg down to Algiers for any specimen of investigation of public sentiment ever pursued that they—the Sunday closers—had not pursued in endeavouring to ascertain the true mind of the country upon this subject. The minority cavilled at their system; but what had they themselves done? Where were their public meetings, their newspapers, and their canvassers? He would take those items one by one. First, the Parliamentary Representatives of Ireland in this House, by an overwhelming majority, pronounced in favour of the measure. It was a majority of every political section throughout the country—a majority of Irish Home Rulers, a majority of Irish Conservatives, a majority of Irish Liberals. Could they have such a concurrence of opinion without representing the voice and feeling of Irishmen? Then, again, let them take the public Press of the country, which, next to Parliamentary representation, he thought might be taken to indicate the feeling of the country. Begin with the daily metropolitan Press. The Irish Times was owned by a princely Gentleman, who, although a brewer, had taken an independent stand on this question; The Freeman's Journal, owned by one whom they had lately gladly welcomed as a Member of the House; The Daily Express, the leading Conservative organ of Ireland; Saunders' News Letter, The Mail—there was not one amongst the daily journals of the metropolis of Ireland which was not in favour of the Bill. The Home Rule Freeman's Journal and the staunch Conservative Daily Express, the Saunders', the Liberal-Conservative Irish Times—all were in favour of it. Turning to the weekly journals and the national journals, which some hon. Members had tried to suppress by coercion—The Nation, The Irishman, The Flag of Ireland, The Weekly News—they were all on the same side—at all events, not one opposing the Bill. There was not a popular weekly journal in Ireland opposed to the Sunday Closing Bill. But the supporters of the Bill were charged with being Sabbatarians. Well, he was a Sabbatarian. He was taught at the knee of his mother, and by the lips of his clergyman, and by the faith of his Church to be a Sabbatarian. He thanked God he belonged to a country which was a Christian land, and when the word Sabbatarian was used to him in scorn he hurled it back in the teeth of those who used it. God forbid the day should ever dawn on Ireland when the Sabbath would not be religiously kept. Those who promoted the measure were also called monomaniacs and fanatics; but who enlisted him (Mr. Sullivan) in the ranks of the cause? Why, the Catholic Archbishop of Cashel. Ah! he heard an hon. Member for a borough, who once represented the county of Tipperary, once say that when he wanted a friend he found Patrick Leahy, the ever-lamented Catholic Archbishop of Cashel, a true friend in need, in many senses besides political; and the other day that same hon. Member (the O'Donoghue) came here and stamped his foot on the grave of that departed Prelate, and called him a fanatic and a monomaniac. In listening to the speeches of those who opposed the Bill on the ground that the liberties of the people should be protected, they must not forget that this measure of Sunday closing had been voluntarily adopted in Tipperary and in "fighting Wexford," whose inhabitants would be the last men to stand any real abridgement of their liberties. The cry was raised that this was a coercive Act. He thought it mournful to hear the phrases of a struggle for liberty imported into the service of the tap; but when he heard that little Party say how they would fight to defend their country from a coercive Bill, he looked around, and he saw amongst them the hon. Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue), who on a previous occasion came here to scream to a foreign nation for more chains for his country. [Cries of "Read."] The hon. Member did not read the other day when he attempted the rôle of "Funny Man" on the woman's suffrage question, and tried to turn into ridicule the speech of another hon. Member. There was nothing more illogical and inconsistent than the action which was taken by the opponents of this measure. They pointed to the fact that according to statistics there was less drunkenness on Sundays than on other days of the week. Archbishop Whately used to ask the children at a Sunday school—"Why do the white sheep in a field eat more grass than the black sheep?" and when they could not answer, he amused himself by telling them—"Because there are more of them." So with this matter—the houses were not allowed to be open as many hours on Sundays as on weekdays. Were hon. Members in favour of opening public-houses during all the 24 hours? ["No!"] Then would they coercively close them during a portion of the time? There was no answer to that; and if they admitted coercion and prohibition for certain hours, then the principle was gone which they asserted. For his own part, he had every interest in the world in sympathy with the popular wishes of his country. Since first his voice was raised in any public issue, he had tried to be on the side of those who would free his countrymen from every shackle that would impede their onward march in liberty, education, and material improvement. Twenty years ago he was labouring to throw open the public gardens and the squares of Dublin to the masses of the people. Who were associated with him in 1855 in that effort? He had surveyed the ranks of the anti-Sunday closers in that House, and he failed to see the face of one man who helped to throw open the squares and museums on that day. [An hon. Member dissented.] The hon. Member seemed to forget that he must have been in bits and tuckers at the time, and could not have lent a helping hand. His hon. Friend did his age great wrong. He (Mr. Sullivan) knew who the men were who did lend a helping hand. They were the Pims and the James Houghtons, and the Wighams, and the Webbs—the identical men who had since taken up the question of Sunday closing. Among them he first was taught that Sunday closing and the prohibition of drink should be accompanied by every effort to provide the people with counter attractions. He challenged the history of the Dublin municipality to contradict him when he said that the men who were the foremost in the Sunday closing movement had been the men to provide the people with healthful recreation. So far from being ashamed of the speech which he had delivered to his constituents on this subject, he was not afraid even to read the travestie of it which had been given by the hon. Member for Tralee, the light comedian of the anti-closing movement. What he told his constituents was this—"Looking to the account I must render to my God at the last day, I would willingly retire from any public honour rather than be dumb upon this question;" and he said so now.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had taunted the hon. Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue) with being the light comedian of the play they were now enacting; but having heard both speeches he certainly would sooner be in the position of the light comedian, than of the heavy tragedian who had just addressed them. Allusion, too, had been made during the debate to the Valley of Jehoshaphat. He (Sir Patrick O'Brien) could only regard as "bathos" the introduction of that "Blessed Jehoshaphat" into a discussion upon Sunday drinking! Were it to be referred to at all in such a connection it could only be when, perhaps, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Louth, travelling upon the new line on which Jehoshaphat would be a station, should be rudely awakened by the voice of the French conducteur, calling out "Jehoshaphat; dix minutes d'arret." The hon. and learned Gentleman said that drunkenness was less on Sunday than on any other day in the week, and he asked why this was so. It was because Parliament in its wisdom had thought proper to restrain the sale of liquor on Sunday. If the hon. and learned Gentleman wished to carry that view to its logical conclusion it would apply with equal, if not to greater, force to the other days of the week to which the hon. and learned Gentleman did not allude. The hon. and learned Gentleman appeared there as the advocate of temperance. Would the hon. and learned Member venture to make this promise—that if the 13 anti-Sunday closers in that House were willing to give up Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, and say that the public-houses should be closed on those days, would the concession be accepted by those benevolent men who assumed alone to have charge of the sympathies and interests of the Irish race? It was, no doubt, true that the Clergy of most denominations and sacerdotalism in all its forms were arrayed on the side of temperance; but did the hon. and learned Member ever go into the county which he specially represented—the county of Louth? If he did, in his drives through the rich pastures of that county, he would no doubt visit the men who could have what they pleased in their own houses. But did he ask what were the views of those who were not so comfortably off—the frieze-coated men whom he met by the roadside? Had he consulted them as to their opinions, and did he find that they were enthusiastic in favour of the Bill? Last year the Government consented to modify their opposition, if the Bill were so drawn that it excluded the large towns. Now, he ventured to say that if this stringent measure was required anywhere in Ireland it was required in the large towns where the artisans were offered those temptations which were inseparable from their congregation together in large numbers. It was a slur upon the county constituencies to say that they were unlike any other class in Ireland and required this legislation. Personally he knew something of the county of Tipperary, and in that county the influence of the Roman Catholic Bishop and Clergy had been sufficient to procure the closing of the public-houses. Could they elsewhere produce the same result, not by coercion, but by sweet persuasion? Was it true statesmanship, especially in a country like Ireland, to attempt to effect a great social reformation by the aid of the police and the dragoons? He could not agree that that was the way in which legislation should be carried out, and it was on that account that he was there to-day, for the first time, to vote against the measure. As to the Petitions which had been presented in favour of the measure, it struck him the other day, when presenting one from his own county, that a good many of the marks were made by humble people living in what might be called aristocratic quarters. The hon. and learned Member for Louth, whose mind was deeply imbued with Scriptural truths, would understand that when he looked at the signatures the Scriptural words—"His man servant or his maid servant or his ox or his ass or anything that was his" occurred to him. Certain sections of the Irish Clergy had taken a strong interest in the question. There was no denying that fact in regard to the North of Ireland; but the people of Ulster looked upon the question from a Sabbatarian point of view quite as strongly as from motives of temperance. He felt that he should be unworthy of the constituency he represented if he hesitated to give expression to the opinion which he found to prevail among them, and he was satisfied that the great majority of feeling of the classes likely to be affected by this legislation was adverse to the Bill. He did not speak of Town Councillors in particular towns, or of wealthy merchants, or rich squires, but of the poor and humble man who might be met at the roadside; and he was strongly of opinion that the proper way to treat him was to educate him into the acceptance of principles of temperance, and not to force them upon him by the exercise of tyranny. He had, as he had already said, never voted upon this question before. An hon. Member sneered when he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) cheered the suggestion of a compromise; but he would remind the hon. Gentleman that compromise was at the bottom of their Parliamentary system. They were now in the month of July. Then let them postpone legislation for the present. He would not meet the question with a direct negative, but let it be put off, and let the Government, who, upon questions of social importance of this kind, ought to occupy the position of guardians of the public interests, let them come forward with a measure in another Session which would deal with Saturday drinking when artizans received their wages. Let them not by passing this Bill thrust down the unwilling throats of the people of Ireland a Sabbatarian measure with which they had no sympathy. They ought to respect the prejudices of the people, of the humble artizan and the humble workman, who did not possess the power of employing gentlemen from Glasgow and rich merchants from Dublin to spend their money with a lavish hand in the advocacy of their particular views. What could they reply to the reproach that would inevitably be addressed to them—"Your honour, some 10 years ago we supported you upon the hustings of such a place. We did not expect then that when the present Government attempted to filch away our rights that you would be prepared to forget us." He was there on that occasion almost the sole supporter of these small people, and for the first time in his life feeling himself obliged to record his vote on the question it should be with the poor artizan and the humble labourer.

DR. O'LEARY remarked that not a single speech that had been made or argument uttered in favour of the Bill had answered the facts and eloquent speech of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Murphy). The hon. Member alluded to the fact that on a recent occasion, with from 50,000 to 60,000 visitors in Cork, there was no drunkenness, although all the porter and gingerbeer had been consumed. The hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) asked, if that were so, what harm could result from Sunday closing; but it was against such a people as that that they were to legislate and impose a ban! The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. R. Smyth) said the opposition to the Bill was a trade question. It was no trade question at all; but it was regarded as an act of coercion, and every man with an unbiassed mind so looked upon it. The hon. Member for Londonderry said it was a burning question. So it was, and he (Dr. O'Leary) thought the Irish Members would manage to put it out before they had done with it. There was a good old rule—"When you have a bad case, always abuse the opposite side," and this had been very much the course pursued in regard to the present Bill. The hon. Member for Londonderry said the minority were adopting the tactics of despair. Now, he (Dr. O'Leary) confessed that he did not feel any despair whatever. On the contrary, he was in the most hopeful humour possible, and he thought he should be able to convince the House that the hon. Member for Londonderry had been more ingenious in his arguments than many would give him credit for. He said, in the first place, that the people of Ireland had asked for the Bill. He (Dr. O'Leary) would take that statement and contrast it with the Petitions. About 8,000 persons in Cork had petitioned in favour of the Bill, and the last Petition presented from Cork against it was signed by 11,000. He read the evidence given before the Select Committee by a magistrate from Cork to show that the overwhelming majority of cases of drunkenness occurred on the Saturday night, and that there were comparatively few on Sunday. In one week there were 26 on the Saturday night and 13 on Sunday; in another, 49 on Saturday night and 12 on Sunday; and in another 13 against 43. The witness, therefore, expressed a strong opinion against Sunday closing altogether. He did not think the drunkenness was sufficiently prevalent to justify the Legislature in imposing penal consequences upon the majority of the people of Ireland. The witness added that the Sunday closing movement was got up by agitators, who convened public meetings and prepared Petitions. This evidence was given on the 17th of April last. On the 18th of February, soon after Parliament assembled, there were eight Petitions against the Bill, with 15,695 signatures, and 168 in favour, with 95,773 signatures. They included, however, no less than 143 Petitions from England. On the 6th of March 2,000 additional persons petitioned against the Bill, and 85,000 in its favour. This was the result of the whole gathering up in every quarter of the three Kingdoms, the result of a busy winter, and of the efforts of the agents of the United Kingdom Alliance, notwithstanding the fact that that Association repudiated all connection with the Bill. 85,000 signatures came in by the 6th of March, and the total number in favour of the Bill amounted to 180,000, while against it there was only a miserable 17,000. There were, consequently, on the 6th of March, 12 to 1 in favour of the Bill. By the 20th of March 6,000 were added to the 180,000, while those opposed to the measure were increased from 17,000 to 33,000. The people of Ireland by that time had begun to find out that they had been misrepresented. They said that they had been taken by surprise; that they did not believe in the Bill, and that they did not want it. From the 13th of March to the 10th of April the Sunday closers got 11,000 signatures, and the anti-closers 51,000. On the 17th of April the witness from Cork to whom he had referred gave his evidence, and it was a well-known fact that reports of the evidence were published daily in the Irish papers. The consequence was that by the 29th of April, 12 days after this evidence was given, the Petitions in favour of the Bill had only increased to 194,000, while those against it amounted to 64,000. On the 4th of May the signatures against numbered 81,453, showing an increase of 30,000 in eight days, while the Sunday closers had only obtained an increase of 6,000. Between May the 1st and May the 4th there was a further increase in the signatures to the Petitions against the Bill of 17,000. These facts were taken from the original documents presented to the House. He said most unhesitatingly that a small party in Ireland had been waiting to educate the people of Ireland upon the question. As he had already said, on May 8th those in favour of Sunday closing had only increased from 202,000 to 206,000, while up to the same date those against it had increased from 81 to 89,000, and the way the question of Petitions stood at present was very different from that in which it was at the beginning of the Session, when the Chief Secretary for Ireland was hurried into accepting the measure. At that time the Minister was led away by a trick that had been played upon the House; but when the people of Ireland found from the newspapers what evidence had been given before the Committee, and when they saw what the Irish Members were asserting in the House itself, they came forward to vindicate their opinions clearly. On the 15th of February the proportions in the Petitions for and against the Bill were as 15 to 1, and on June the 5th the proportions had changed from 2½ to 1. And he should ask the Members of the Government whether they would submit to the trick that had been played on the House. There was another simple fact he would refer to. No less than 138 Petitions came from England, and if they deducted the number of signatures to these as well as the 110,000 in the Petitions from Dublin, Cork, Limerick, and the other large towns of Ireland, only 100,000 names would be left for the whole of the rest of the country. He said unhesitatingly that that was a very small proportion of names for the vast area lying outside of the towns that had sent up 110,000 names in favour of this measure, and could it be said that that in any way represented public opinion? But these Petitions were signed not only by men and women, but by boys and girls. Did they represent the opinion of Ireland? He said they did not, and for that, among other reasons, he argued that they ought to see further into it before they passed the Bill. He was glad to see that the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had come into his place, for he had a few words to say about him and his speech. The hon. and learned Gentleman asked how they would obtain the opinion and the views of the Irish people. He answered at once by Petitions, and by such an answer Ireland had not alone spoken, but she would still continue to speak. The Petitions against this Bill had risen in the periods he had named from a few names to 80,000, to 81,000, to 89,000, and next month, if they waited to hear it, they would speak to the extent of very like 200,000 strong. That was the way in which they ascertained the opinion of the people of Ireland. They would get Petitions signed, they would accept door to door visitations, and they would even appeal to newspapers in answer to the question of the hon. and learned Member for Louth. Mr. Russell, a clear-headed, energetic, and enthusiastic Scotchman, who had got all these Petitions signed in favour of the Bill, was examined by the Committee that sat on the subject. He was asked by his hon. Friend the Member for Dublin (Mr. Brooks) to read a paragraph from the Circular that was distributed amongst the people, in which it was stated that arrests for drunkenness in Edinburgh and Glasgow since the Scottish Act was passed had gone down 80 per cent, and that the Act met with the entire sympathy of the people of Scotland. That ingenious gentleman, Mr. Russell, stated that the arrests for drunkenness went down 80 per cent; but what he (Dr. O'Leary) wanted to know was, whether drunkenness had decreased 80 per cent. That gentleman said so, and all he would say in answer was, that such a statement was a lie. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes, he said, he could say nothing else—it was a lie, a deliberate fraudulent mis-statement. This ingenious and honest Scotchman had given the people of Ireland to understand that that was the case. But his hon. Friend (Mr. Brooks) extracted from the Chief Constable of Ayrshire a very different statement. He told the Committee that offences against the person and against the guardians of the peace, as well as cases of drunk and incapable, had increased in a marked degree during the last year, and nearly all those offences were the result of drunkenness. But the second question put to this ingenious, veracious, and energetic Scotchman was more significant, and he trusted that when he gave it that the fact would strengthen the hands of the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the Government, as well as the House generally, in resisting any more of this twaddle from being presented. The question was whether the statement about the 80 per cent decrease of drunkenness in Scotland had influenced people in signing the Petition. And what was the answer of this simple-minded and honest Scotchman? He said he was not aware that it did. Not aware that it did? Why, how could such a statement as that do otherwise than affect simple-minded women, who would argue that if they signed the Petition there would be such a great decrease of drunkenness in Ireland that they would get 80 per cent more of the money of their husbands than they were in the habit of doing? But then this honest and simple-minded gentleman let out in a very incidental way that the statement was meant to influence the influx of signatures. Of course it was, and no doubt it did. When the acute Scotch mind was brought to bear on the poor mind and stupid intellect of the Irish peasant they could all tell what would take place. Could anybody doubt it? Then the hon. and learned Member for Louth spoke of the journals of Ireland, and said that all the organs, daily and weekly, were in favour of this measure. Enumerating, among others, The Irish Times, he said it was in favour of Sunday Closing. The Irish Times was not in favour of the Bill, and would repudiate any such a notion. Then he went on to make the same assertion with reference to the weekly journals, and among others he mentioned The Nation, of which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Sullivan) is proprietor. It was very recently that The Nation had gone in for the policy of obstruction that was carried on in the House, and the hon. and learned Gentleman talked about his conscientiousness. Why did he not follow out that recommendation, and join the ranks of those who had adopted that policy? He believed that the hon. and learned Member was not present at a quarter-past 7 that morning when divisions were being taken. Therefore, the hon. and learned Member was not following out the opinions advocated in his own journal. The hon. and learned Gentleman also proclaimed himself a Sabbatarian, and he had described to the House how he had become so. He said he had drawn it in with his mother's milk. He (Dr. O'Leary) did not see very well how that could be; but if he did, he must have been a very smart young fellow indeed when he was in long clothes. Most people did not begin to form their opinions at so very early an age. They were not generally Sabbatarians in Ireland. But what was a Sabbatarian? He was not a lawyer himself, but he had come across a very scarce and learned work which might help the House to understand what strictly a Sabbatarian was; and perhaps after he had given the House the definition hon. Gentlemen who had proclaimed that they were Sabbatarians might not think they were quite right in the assertion they made. The book to which he referred was Burton's Parliamentary Diary of the Proceedings of the House from 1656 to 1659. Colonel Holland said in the debate that was taking place in June, 1657, regarding penalties for Sabbath-breaking—

“We have but too many penal laws, and one hundred clauses of that kind may well be repealed. These laws are always turned upon the most godly. This is very strict as to that of unnecessary walking, and coming into men’s houses.”—[ii. 261.]

He would tell the House what a strict Sabbatarian was. In a code of laws made in the dominion of Newhaven in 1637 by emigrants from England, it was provided that “no one should either run on the Sabbath day nor walk in his garden or elsewhere, except reverently to and from meeting.” He was very much inclined to think that some of the Sabbatarians would protest against that. But there was more behind. It said—“No one shall travel, cook victuals, make beds, sweep house, cut hair, or shave on the Sabbath day.” But there is a tit-bit to come which will, I hope, appeal to the filial feelings of the hon. and learned Member for Louth. It was provided “That no woman shall kiss her child on the Sabbath or fasting day.” He quoted this, not to say a word against the conscientious belief of any man, but simply to show to what lengths men would go who were willing to submerge themselves under a word and accept all the responsibility which that word implied. Lord Chief Justice Glynn moved against the clause in the Bill for entering into men’s houses. He said—

“I move against this clause. It may be a snare to all the nation; and knaves in the night time may enter and rob men’s houses under this pretence. When an Act of Parliament gives liberty of entry, then a man may break open doors.”—[ii. 263.]

It seemed, therefore, that drinking in private houses was suspicious; but the same suspicion was attached in a much more serious degree to those held for the purpose, for Mr. Godfrey moved a proviso to limit the officers’ entry only to taverns, inns, ale-houses, tobacco-shops, victualling-houses, or tippling-houses. They included “tobacco-shops,” and he believed that these places yet caused a good deal of illicit drinking. This just showed how far-sighted people were 250 years ago. He had discussed this question with a great many people lately, and all of them gave it as their opinion that if this Bill was passed it would lead to a great deal of drinking in private houses, with considerable harm to the people themselves, and to the destruction of family morality, and lead to more serious things still. It was a curious fact that in 1657 this very argument was used, for he found that Mr. Vincent and Mr. Chadwick, two Members of the House, not being satisfied with the proviso, Mr. Godfrey said—

“Now-a-days the greatest disorders were in private houses by sending thither for drink, drinking in alehouses being both more penal and suspicious.”—[ii. 263.]

However, there were other provisos in the Bill, the discussion of which he was referring to. He found a Mr. West saying that he hoped they would not give liberty to people to be as profane as they chose in their own houses. He argued against the proviso because it would not give idle persons permission “to sit openly at gates or doors,” and he found that they were not even allowed to “lean against their own doorpost.” A Major General Whalley—not the hon. Gentleman who now had a seat in the House, though he was glad he had traced the ancestry of the hon. Gentleman so far—he was very glad to see had put in a seasonable word against the passing of a clause preventing people sitting at their own doors, or even leaning against them, on the ground that it would “deprive them of the very livelihood they have by the air; as at Nottingham many people that have houses in the rock and have no air live most part of their time without doors.”—[ii. 264.]

And the Lord Chief Justice backed this up by the remark that

“there was nothing unlawful or guilty in sitting at doors. It must be the same as within doors. It is but intended for example’s sake. May not a godly man that lives in a rock yet be well employed? Yet you put a negative pregnant upon a man to say that sitting at a door is more profane than standing.”—[ii. 265.]

Yet these were the view of strict Sabbatarians. One other observation of the hon. and learned Member for Louth he would refer to. He said that the hon. Member for Tralee (the O’Donoghue) had put his hoof down upon the grave of the Archbishop of Cashel. All he could say was that he did not believe the hon. Member referred to was a horse, and certainly he did not think he was an ass. The hon. and learned Gentleman also said there was less drinking on Sunday than on any other day. How was that, he wanted to know? The hon. and learned Member said that arose from the fact that the hours capable of being applied to drinking were fewer on Sunday than on any other day. But was that so? He believed the argument would not hold water. To whom did the hon. and learned Gentleman refer? Was he speaking of those gentlemen who could sit at home, or, when taking a walk, pass a public-house, knowing they could get what refreshment they required at home; or was he speaking of the artisans, for whom he professed so much love and consideration? Where were the artisans on Sundays and on week days? He believed this was just another statement which showed how far fanaticism was capable of carrying the minds of the most intelligent men away. The hours of the working man during the week prevented his leaving work before 6 in the evening, and he very likely did not reach home before half-past 6. Before he got some supper it was after 7, and then, if he took a walk with his wife—and he hoped the hon. and learned Member did not believe that artisans did not love their wives enough occasionally to take a walk with them—it would be at least half-past 7 before he could get to the public-house. Well, all that was left for drinking was only three hours and a-half—from 7.30 to 11. Now, how many hours had he on Sunday? On Sunday his time was all his own, and he could drink from 2 till 9—seven hours. In the face of that fact was it fair to say that the working men drank less on Sunday, because the hours were restricted? There was only one word more he had to say. The hon. and learned Gentleman remarked, after looking round these benches upon which he sat, that there was no one who agitated for this Bill who did not agitate for the opening of the parks and museums to the people 20 years ago, and that there was no one who opposed this measure who laboured in that cause. In 1855 he (Dr. O'Leary) was one of the persons who were working with him. Another thing the hon. and learned Gentleman should remember was that at that time, on account of advocating national principles, he was not so much in favour as he was now. One word more he had to say. The hon. and learned Gentleman said when he (Dr. O'Leary) contradicted him, that if there was such a man he must have been in bibs and tuckers. One did not know the proper time for casting swaddling clothes or for putting on bibs and tuckers, or for donning unmentionables. But if he (Dr. O'Leary) did support and work with the hon. and learned Gentleman when he was in bibs and tuckers, all the more honour to him, for in that case he was almost as smart a fellow as the hon. and learned Gentleman himself, when he learned Sabbatarianism at his mother's breast. He might have been young, but he was earnest and ardent. He remembered, too, that at that time the hon. Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue) was the rising sun of Ireland, and received all the honours, and that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Louth was anything but a rising sun.

MR. B. WHITWORTH said, that in his town (Kilkenny), of the 3,384 persons who signed Petitions, 1,680 persons were in favour of the Bill, 179 were opposed to it, and 167 returned blank forms of the questions put to them. Therefore, he found that 90 out of 100 of the people of Kilkenny were in favour of the passing of the Bill. When he appeared there as a candidate he had the honour of being opposed by the licensed victuallers of Dublin, who sent down a gentleman whom all Irish Members knew well, as he always appeared in the Lobby when there was a question concerning the licensed victuallers. He referred to Mr. Dwyer, the secretary, who stayed in the town for a week, and represented him as the greatest enemy of the licensed victuallers. Yet he could safely say that nine-tenths of the publicans of Kilkenny voted for him, although they knew he was in favour of Sunday-closing. It was not fair, from what he knew, to say that the people of Ireland were not in favour of this Bill. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down represented a very ancient town, which he knew very well, and he (Mr. Whitworth) said that on that question four-fifths of the electors of Drogheda were in favour of Sunday closing. He challenged him to meet him in Drogheda to test in public whether or not he fairly represented the views of the electors. Another strong opponent of the Bill was the hon. Member for Dunkalk (Mr. Callan), who promised to meet him at a public meeting to discuss this question, but showed the white feather, and dared not meet him.

MR. CALLAN wished to know whether that was an expression which ought to be applied to an hon. Member who was accidentally prevented from attending the meeting? The hon. Member for Kilkenny had stated that he dared not meet him, he knowing full well that the contrary was the fact.

MR. B. WHITWORTH said, these Members knew perfectly well that they misrepresented the public opinion of Ireland; but they never discussed the question in a public meeting, as they were well aware they would find themselves in as great a minority as they were in that House. Something had been said about the United Kingdom Alliance, of which he (Mr. Whitworth) was Chairman, having voted money for election purposes. He could say that during the 10 years he had been connected with that great agency not 1s. had been spent for such a purpose. Money had been spent for publications, but not for elections. It could not be said, as a general rule, that the people of Ireland were united, but on this question they were undoubtedly so. He was aware, however, that some Members of that House were instigated by the trade organization in Dublin, but they did not truly represent the feeling of their constituents. A gentleman had been sent down by that body to oppose him in the election for the borough he now represented. He hoped the Government would allow sufficient time for the passing of this measure. If they did not, it would be a great reflection on the Parliamentary government of this country.

MR. KIRK said, that the restrictions proposed by this Bill were not at all necessary. He had lived for a number of years in an agricultural district in the county of Louth; nor did he think that the statistics that had been quoted with reference to the shortening of hours on Sunday had anything to do with the fact that there was less drinking on that day than on any other. A gentleman who had been Solicitor General for Ireland said, when this matter was brought before the Poor Law Board, that he had found by statistics that there was more drinking went on in those counties on Sundays in which restrictions were placed upon the hours during which the public-houses were open than there was in those where there was no such restriction. Coercive measures would never, in his opinion, do what the promoters of this Bill desired; and, in fact, it had not been introduced in order to restrict the hours upon which drink should be sold on Sunday, but purely from Sabbatarian reasons. And he saw in a newspaper some time ago that Sabbatarians wished to cram their opinion down the throats of those who did not agree with them. Scotchmen were rather given to that kind of thing. He believed himself that, if they could, they would even go so far as to press people to wear the kilt. As a county Member he protested against the Bill, and regretted that its promoters had not accepted the compromise which had been offered them. The people who would be affected by the Bill were not the rich, but the poor; and he had ascertained from many of these in his own country what their feelings were upon the matter. The artizans and the labouring men with whom he had conversed told him that they were opposed to Sunday closing. Really, the drinking did not go on in the agricultural districts, but in towns. If the Bill were passed it would be regarded by the Irish people as a measure of coercion and as a piece of class legislation; and even the most ignorant would be thoroughly dissatisfied with it.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, that in rising to oppose the introduction of this Bill into Committee, he should be careful not to introduce any old facts in doing so after the lecture which the hon. Member for Cork city (Mr. Murphy) got from The Times in an inspired article which appeared on Thursday last. The only remark he would make on that article was that the writer of it must not have been in the House when the hon. Member delivered his speech, as every man who heard it must admit that it was very able, and that the hon. Member brought forward a large number of new facts in support of his Amendment. He (Mr. O'Sullivan) should oppose the Bill from various reasons. First of all, he would oppose it because it was a piece of class legislation, and class legislation of the worst kind, forced on by the rich minority to curtail the privileges of the working classes. He next opposed it because, to a certain extent, it confiscated the business of thousands of small shopkeepers in Ireland, while, at the same time, it would not put a stop to drinking, but would merely transfer part of the traffic in drink from the general body of traders to the large grocers on Saturday evenings and the remainder to the shebeen-house keepers on Sundays, without offering any compensation whatever to the sufferers by the enforcement of the measure. In the next place, he felt bound to oppose the Bill because he believed it would be found to increase both drunkenness and immorality; and, lastly, he opposed it because it was contrary to the wishes of a very large majority of his fellow-countrymen. Having given his reasons for opposing the measure, he should at once proceed to give the House some very strong evidence in support of his objections. The only way to prove that the Bill was a piece of class legislation was by referring to the Petitions that had been sent in favour of it, and to see where they came from, and how they were got up, with the class of persons who signed them. He wondered whether hon. Members ever examined the Petitions they presented to the House. If they did not he did. On his arrival in town at the beginning of February, he found a Petition waiting for him from a parish in his own county in favour of this Bill. Knowing the parish well whence it was sent, he looked over the Petition and found it contained a total of 23 signatures. Of these 23, he was aware that 16 were Protestants, and out of those 16 he was well aware that not three of them ever went inside a public-house in his life. He was very sorry to introduce the question of any man's religion into a debate, as religious differences had always been the cause of the misfortunes of his country; but he had mentioned the fact in this instance simply to show who were getting up those Petitions. Well, who signed them? They were signed by four classes—the extreme teetotallers, to whom he gave every credit for their sincerity—the Sabbatarians, who were the backbone of the movement, and who would not allow people to whistle on Sunday if they could prevent it—by a number of maiden ladies of the Moody and Sankey school—and school girls and boys over whom the parson ruled supreme. He might mention to the House that a Petition from his own parish of Kilmallock was presented to that House by the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. R. Smyth), signed by 48 persons, 21 of whom were Protestants, although they formed only 3 per cent of the population. Of the remainder, five were in the employment of a gentleman who took a great interest in the Bill, two were children, who were put down as "students," and there were only 19 who could be described as "free and independent" petitioners. Yet what was the fact? He held in his hand a Petition from the same parish. That Petition was signed by 300 persons, and amongst the first who signed it he found the names of 17 out of the 19 "free and independent" individuals who had signed the other Petition to which he had referred. That was the way in which these Petitions were got up, and if the hon. Gentleman had any doubt on the matter he could examine the signatures. Having disposed of the two Petitions from his own locality, he would ask the House to bear with him while he examined the general Petitions presented to this House in favour of the Bill from the Returns of Public Petitions presented to this House, and see who presented them, and where and what sort of persons they emanated from, and then say if those were the persons hon. Members judged by when they said this was an Irish idea. The hon. Member then called attention to the Petitions presented in favour of this Bill for the last two months from England, Scotland, and different religious bodies in the North of Ireland, composed of Methodists, Quakers, Wesleyans, Presbyterians, and other sects, and showed that five-sixths of all the Petitions presented in favour of the Bill were from the Sabbatarian class. He was opposed to the Bill, in the second place, because it confiscated a large portion of the property of 16,000 or 17,000 respectable traders in Ireland without giving them 1s. compensation for their loss. It was a well-known fact that the Government could take away property if they thought it would benefit society to do so, and they gave that same power very properly to Railway Companies, which were a benefit to society; but it was a very well understood maxim that the Government never took the property of any person without making compensation to the persons who suffered; but the promoters of this Bill had made no provision whatever for those who suffered by their Bill. On this point he would quote the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench in Ireland, who said that existing vested interests should not be extinguished, even for a legitimate object, without full compensation. Alluding to the reduction of public-houses in Dublin, he said not even the Government could close up those houses without giving compensation to their owners for the loss they would sustain. When Parliament abolished slavery in their Colonies they made compensation to the owners of those slaves, though it was a trade few men sympathised with. In fact, it was a trade which Englishmen felt ashamed of; yet, notwithstanding this, they gave compensation to those who trafficked in human flesh simply because they were depriving them of part of their property. Then, again, when they abolished purchase in the Army, they gave compensation to the officers who suffered by the change. Notwithstanding the fact that purchase in the Army was declared illegal by an Act of George III., that did not prevent this House making compensation to all who suffered by the change. In the present case they were going to destroy a portion of the property of a number of regularly licensed traders, and he asked the House if they considered it just or right to do so without compensating those men? If they did so, what would the publicans and their friends justly say, but that because they had no friends in the large Clubs of London, or they had no influence with either of the great Parties who managed the business of the State, they were plundered out of their property without getting 1s. compensation. Would that add to the confidence or good opinion of English government in Ireland? No, it would still more weaken that which was feeble enough already. They had been told that this Bill would put a stop to the drunkard, and make a sober man of him. He (Mr. O'Sullivan) wished that it did, for there was not a man in that Assembly who would support a measure having that result more warmly than he would; but how had it been shown by any of the eloquent advocates of the Bill that it would lessen intemperance? On the contrary, he showed the House on the second reading of the Bill, by means of a Return obtained through Lord Emly, that there were more cases of drunkenness in equal populations in the part of the country that he had the honour to represent, where the houses were closed on Sundays, than there were in the portion of the same county where the houses were open on that day. Before sitting down he wished to give the House some other reasons to prove how very few people in the country were in favour of the Bill. At two Catholic churches in the county which he represented Petitions were laid on the tables at the doors of each during two Masses, and the clergyman called the attention of the people to those Petitions. At one of those churches, where there was a population of 900, the Petition was signed by 12 persons; and at the other, where there was a population of over 1,500, it was signed by just three persons. Then, again, in the principal bank of the town in which he (Mr. O'Sullivan) resided, the local gentleman who, he had already told the House, was very active in getting up Petitions in favour of this Bill, left one of those Petitions on the public counter for the purpose of having it signed. He (Mr. O'Sullivan) had occasion to go to the bank for five consecutive days, and through those five days there was not a single name signed to the Petition, though thousands of persons must have seen it in that time. Would the House require further proof to show how unpopular this Bill was amongst the people whom it affected? The Sunday closers depended more on votes than they did on arguments in carrying their Bill. If the Sunday closing gentlemen laid out one-half the money they were spending in promoting the Bill on the improvement of labourers' dwellings in Ireland, they would find they would do far more to promote the cause of temperance and morality than they could ever accomplish by the Bill now before the House. But the fact was, that these people looked upon the tradesmen and labourers in his country as a parcel of children who required to be watched in all their movements. On Sunday drunkenness was much less in proportion than on any other day in the week. The arrests on Sunday in Leitrim, instead of being 1-7th, were only 1-30th; in Londonderry, 1-36th; in Louth and Roscommon, 1-15th; in Mayo, 1-13th; in the North Riding of Tipperary, where the public-houses were open, 1-18th; and in the South Riding, where they were in a great part closed, 1-13th. In four districts of Tipperary, where the population numbered 23,270, and the public-houses were open, the convictions for drunkenness on Sunday in 1876 were 649; while in three districts of the same county, with a population of 4,352, where the public-houses were closed, the convictions were 894. Take the Tipperary petty sessions district, with a population of 16,953—a district where total Sunday closing was carried out at the request of the late Archbishop—and compare it with several similar sized in the neighbouring counties where the public-houses were open on Sunday. The total number of convictions for drunkenness in this district for the year 1876 was 771. The nearest town he could get in the next county where public-houses were open on Sundays, with about an equal population, was Fermoy, county Cork. With a population of 15,179, or a little less than Tipperary, the convictions for drunkenness in 1876 were 219, or very little more than one-fourth the drunkenness which took place in the district where Sunday closing was observed. The next town he could find with a similar population to that of Tipperary in the next adjoining county was Newcastle West, in the county Limerick. With a population of 16,987, or just 34 persons more than Tipperary, he found the convictions for drunkenness in that district, where the public-houses were open on Sunday, during the year 1876 was 390, or about one-half the convictions that took place in Tipperary, with a smaller population, and where the public-houses were supposed to be all closed on Sundays. It was true the House referred this Bill to a Select Committee; but what confidence did they think would be placed in that Committee by the people of the South, the West, and the East of Ireland, when they found that more than one-third of the Committee was composed of Representatives from the Scotch, Sabbatarian North of Ireland, where nine-tenths of the agitation for this Bill was carried on, and that more than one-fourth of the Committee was composed of extreme teetotallers who would look on it as almost a crime for any man to take a pint of beer or a glass of whiskey? He had given the House some statistics;

but if he were to go through them all he would require two more hours to finish his observations.

It being now ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till this day.

The House suspended its sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its sitting at Nine of the clock.

VACCINATION.—RESOLUTION.

EARL PERCY, in rising to move—

said, he did not bring the question forward because he was in any sense opposed to vaccination. On the contrary, he emphatically stated that no one could have a higher estimate than he had of the value of vaccination; and his object on that occasion was, if possible, to improve the present mode of practising it rather than in any way to diminish the benefits accruing from it. There were a class of persons in this country who called themselves anti-vaccinationists. They were not very numerous, but their number was increasing, and they were extremely active. The language which they held, while in many respects foolish, was to a certain extent mischievous, and worthy the attention of those who had the control of the manner in which vaccination was carried out. He confessed he had a certain sympathy with those persons; but he was not disposed in any degree to palliate their resistance to the law or their efforts to incite others to resist it. Neither was he inclined to defend those who, he was sorry to say, in different parts of the country, occupying posts of trust for enforcing the law, showed themselves very slack in putting it into operation. He was, however, anxious that those who opposed vaccination should be left without a shadow of excuse for their conduct. The notions of those persons were in many ways very erroneous. Since he had taken up that subject he had received many letters about it from various sources. In one of them the absurd idea was expressed that the failure of the French in the Franco-German War was due to the fact that all French soldiers were subjected to compulsory vaccination. The agitation on that question had almost assumed a political character, electors being urged to sign a pledge that they would vote in favour of no candidate for a seat in that House who did not promise to oppose compulsory vaccination. There was no greater pest than the taking up of a catch-cry and making it a test question at elections, and vaccination was about the last subject that he wished to see treated in that way. An article in one of the organs of the anti-vaccinationists was headed "The wickedness of enforcing unjust laws and the duty of resisting them." Now, there might be a question whether a particular law was good or bad, but when a law was once established it was incumbent on all good citizens to respect it. The spirit which actuated some of the anti-vaccinationists prompted them to suggest that where vaccination had been compulsorily carried out, means should be employed to render it a failure. He did not know whether any antidote to vaccination was known; but the spirit to which he had referred ought, if possible, to be suppressed. Members of the highest classes of society, and even of that House, had expressed to him their disinclination to allow their children to be vaccinated from the ordinary lymph, but only from lymph which they could trace from an undoubted source. That might or might not be reasonable; but it at any rate showed in some minds certain doubts of the nature of the lymph that was now generally used. It was desirable that we should take away any excuse for such a feeling, and give them the certainty that the lymph was the purest and the most efficacious which could be secured. The statistics upon the subject were frequently quoted to show the most contrary results; and, therefore, he should use them only with the greatest diffidence, leaving the House to take them for what they were worth. The allegations made against the lymph now in use were twofold—firstly, that it had by constant transmission through various persons lost its force; and, secondly, that it was a vehicle for other maladies. With regard to the first of these allegations, he thought it was admitted by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board that there had been very little new lymph introduced into the public vaccination establishments for the last 70 years; and hon. Members might judge for themselves whether the lymph in use was not likely to have deteriorated in that time. Before Jenner instituted vaccination in 1796, the deaths from small-pox were 52,000 annually. But from that date down to 1825 there was no epidemic of small-pox. In 1838 there was a small-pox epidemic; another in 1840-1; others in 1845, 1848, 1851-2, 1857-9, 1863-5, 1870-2, and at the present time. The deaths in the epidemic of 1857-9 were 14,244; those in 1863-5, 20,059; and those in 1871-2, 44,840. The increase of the population between the first two of those dates was 7 per cent, and of deaths from small-pox nearly 50 per cent; and between the second and third periods the increase of the population was 10 per cent, and of the fatalities from small-pox 120 per cent. From 1854 to 1863 there were 33,515 deaths, and from 1864 to 1873, 70,458; and the Registrar General, in his Report for 1872, said that while the annual mortality in the 20 years was at the rate of 2·4, in 1871 it was 10·24, and in 1872 8·33, and this with the most laudable efforts to extend vaccination by legislation. It was sometimes said that the number of deaths were fewer in comparison with the number of cases; but that would not defeat the position which he took up. The weakness of the lymph now in use had been long admitted. As to the idea that other diseases were transmissible through vaccine lymph, that was of course a subject that required a professional mind to appreciate the facts of the case. In 1857 it was the almost universal opinion of doctors that vaccination could not carry with it any other disease. Mr. Simon, Medical Officer to the Privy Council, in his Report, said that almost all the most eminent doctors in all parts of Europe denied the possibility of any other malady being transmitted by means of vaccination. But the opinions of doctors on that subject had very materially changed within the last few years. M. Ricord, Mr. Simon, Dr. Ballard, and Mr. Hutchinson, were instances of those who had at length admitted that diseases might be, and, indeed, were sometimes, transmitted by vaccine lymph. Admitting that evil might occur from the use of impure lymph, the first doubt was as to how great that danger was. As long as that doubt remained in people's minds they naturally took considerable interest in obtaining lymph as pure as possible, and in being able to trace it to its source. He might be asked what remedy he had to propose for this state of things. He candidly confessed that he had no remedy to propose. He did not think himself competent, and he rather doubted whether the House itself was competent, at once and directly to propose such a remedy. But if what he had stated was true—if small-pox was on the increase, and if, on the other hand, the transmission of disease by vaccine matter had been proved to have occurred, he thought that he was justified in moving that some further inquiry should be made into the subject. He should be content to leave the form of the inquiry, whether it should be by Commission or Committee, to the Government and the House. Perhaps, however, he might venture to suggest that further inquiry should be made into the results of the Belgian system of vaccination from the calf, which, it was asserted, had been most successful. It was true that some time ago the President of the Local Government Board had, in reply to the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Surrey (Sir Trevor Lawrence), stated that Dr. Seaton had reported unfavourably of that system as being uncertain and violent in its effects; but it must be remembered that Dr. Seaton made his investigations into the Belgian system in 1869, and that it had been greatly improved since then. The Lancet, in commenting upon the answer of the President of the Local Government Board, declared that the time had come when further investigation into that system had become imperative, and that the feeling of medical men in Belgium was steadily growing in favour of animal vaccination. He therefore suggested that the point to be investigated was whether the statements publicly made in Belgium on this subject were correct or not; and in the event of their being shown to be incorrect, what means could be adopted in this country for obtaining purer lymph than we now possessed. He knew four or five medical men in this country who had for some time practised animal vaccination with the greatest success, and he had also heard that it had proved equally successful in America. He must remind the House that our Vaccination Laws were of an exceptional character, and that, therefore, it was especially necessary that we should guard the child whom we vaccinated—often against the will of its parent—from even the suspicion of danger. He thought that no expense of a moderate amount should be spared to bring this question to a successful issue. The Amendment of the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) was one from which, speaking for himself, he should not dissent; but if any hon. Member could devise any better means than at present existed by which vaccination could be carried out, he would throw no objection in the way. He was strongly of opinion that there should be some inquiry into the practice, as to whether an improvement should not be made in the carrying out of vaccination, and therefore it was he brought forward his Motion.

MR. GREENE, in seconding the Resolution, expressed his regret that there was not a fuller House to listen to the debate upon this subject; but after the proceedings of last night the thinness of the House was not a matter of surprise. The subject was one which was occupying the public mind in various ways. There was no doubt that there was much misunderstanding on the question. People were apt to believe that every attempted operation of vaccination was successful, but such was not the case, and he made this statement on the authority of several eminent medical men. There was no doubt, however, that wherever persons had been properly vaccinated the cases of small-pox had been very few indeed, and there had been scarcely any deaths; and, therefore, he was the more anxious to remove all possible objections that could be raised against it. Like all other scientific questions, vaccination required occasional investigation, as new facts were discovered; but he thought there could be no doubt as to the general proposition that its effect was beneficial, and the facts which had been quoted by the noble Lord made it equally clear that vaccination by means of animal lymph had better effects than were produced by means of the lymph ordinarily used. It was important that at the present time an inquiry should be made, and he hoped that the Committee asked for by the noble Lord would be granted.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is expedient that an inquiry should be instituted into the practice of vaccination, for the purpose of ascertaining whether it cannot be conducted in a more satisfactory manner than it is at present."—(Earl Percy.)

MR. PEASE, in rising to move, as an Amendment, to add—

"And whether the Law relating to the accumulation or repetition of penalties for the same offence does not require amendment," said, he agreed entirely with the views of the noble Lord as to the importance of vaccination; but he wished to bring again before the House the question of inflicting cumulative penalties upon offenders against the laws relating to vaccination. He had already brought the question before the House in a general form on one or two occasions; but, as he saw no similar opportunity in the course of the present Session of doing so, he had thought it right to raise it on the matter of vaccination, the law concerning which, as far as the question of penalties went, seemed to him unduly harsh. In judging of the results of vaccination, they ought to make some allowance for constitutional derangement, difficulties in the carrying out of the law, and want of experience in the practitioner. When, however, they came to consider the subject of cumulative penalties, they ought to remember that, according to the Return before the House, there had been, from 1870 to 1874, 5,490 prosecutions, 2,650 convictions, 103 double convictions, 43 persons convicted three times, 20 five times, four 9 times, four 10 times, one 12 times, two 16, and two 19 times, for non-compliance with the Act. Such a list as that formed, in effect, a great barrier in the way of carrying out a sanitary law. He had received letters from various counties, the writers stating that they had suffered many penalties, one to the extent of £45; another, who had been fined £19 in two years, and would suffer more rather than have their children vaccinated. They had also the case of a Board of Guardians marched off to York Castle to purge their contempt for disobedience to the law. He did not deny that compulsion might be necessary; but the kind of compulsion that ought to be resorted to was a different matter. A police officer could not enter a cottage by force and carry off a child to be vaccinated. The child remained unvaccinated, and all the law did was to fine the parent. The law, as it now stood, was one law for the rich and another for the poor, because the rich man could afford to pay the fine and the poor man could not. There was a good deal of distrust of medical men amongst the working classes; because unless sufficient care was taken it was, of course, possible to inoculate a disease worse than small-pox itself. He had in his hand a letter from a gentleman who stated that he would rather pay any amount of fines than have his only surviving child vaccinated. He had lost his other children who had been vaccinated, but the child in question was a healthy child, and he would suffer any penalty rather than submit it to the process. There was no logic in their present proceeding; for, as he had said, the child was allowed to go free and remain unvaccinated, while cumulative penalties were heaped upon the parent. It was a question of the degree of compulsion that should be used to attain the object which they had in view. As long as the present uncertainty existed, it was impossible to go on with the present system of accumulating fines upon the head of the same luckless individual. If there were those who did not believe in the theory of vaccination, he thought they should be let off upon as low terms as possible, as long as the merely idle and careless did not escape. His object had been to show the great hardship of these fines upon people who, having seen the effect of vaccination upon their own families, demurred to having their children poisoned by this process. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Amendment.

MR. JAMES, in seconding the Amendment, said, that this question had not been discussed in the present Parliament; but if the present system was to be maintained it would be necessary to have some inquiry into its working. The statistics were imperfect, and it was difficult to make out how far vaccination had been really successful. A certain number of people were opposed to it, and it was only by repeated inquiries and discussions that its great advantages would be generally recognized, and not by imposing these constant penalties, which amounted in some cases to persecution. Would Members of that House like to take their children to be vaccinated at some low vaccination-station like Bethnal Green or the purlieus of Westminster, where they could make no inquiry as to the antecedents of the children from whom the vaccine matter was taken? It was almost impossible to controvert the result of the Report of the Committee of 1871—namely, that cow-pox was a very great protection against small-pox, and if the operation were properly performed injury to the health would not follow. Some poor children, and even adults, had been injured by vaccination, and by the use of dirty instruments. He trusted that the Government would adopt the principle of the Scotch Act. Even with all these cumulative penalties the State might go on fining, but did not secure the vaccination of the child. In the case of Abel he hoped the right hon. Gentleman opposite would prevent further prosecutions against him. The feeling out-of-doors was not so much against the right hon. Gentleman as against the officials of the Local Government Board, who wished, apparently, to be autocrats.

Amendment proposed,

To add, at the end of the Question, the words "and whether the Law relating to the accumulation or repetition of penalties for the same offence does not require amendment."—(Mr. Pease.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE, having vaccinated thousands and superintended the vaccination of tens of thousands, thought the dissatisfaction which prevailed in the country was somewhat exaggerated, and that it was largely counteracted by a very strong feeling in favour of vaccination. He deprecated the idea that the subject could be treated from the point of view of those who thought they knew their own constitutions and those of their children—a notion which, if carried out, would lead to such practice as that of the ship surgeon, who said to his passenger patients—"You are old enough to know your own constitution; there is the medicine chest; take what you think will do you good." The statistics relating to the attendants at the London hospitals were remarkable, as showing an almost complete immunity from small-pox on the part of those who had been re-vaccinated; but vaccination could not be done carelessly, or in a hurry. The operation in itself was not an uncertain one, and the failures were due to the want of care and skill on the part of medical men, one of whom surprised him the other day, when vaccinating a child of his own, by using ivory points instead of fresh lymph from the arm or tubes. He hoped the President of the Local Government Board would favour all measures that could promote efficiency; and, in particular, that he would do what he could to facilitate animal vaccination. One medical man in London had kept up a supply of animal vaccine; but the expense of maintaining it was so considerable, and the applications for it were so few, that he was obliged to give up keeping it. What was really required was a sufficient supply of animal lymph for emergencies like that caused by the small-pox epidemic of the present year, to meet the prejudices of those who objected to vaccination from arm to arm.

MR. HOPWOOD warned the House against committing itself to any dogmatic certainty on the subject of vaccination, pointing out that the unanimity which once prevailed among the Medical Profession in reference to the now discarded and prohibited system of inoculation ought to make people cautious in that respect. The question, he urged, was not altogether a medical one, but ought to be viewed in relation to the feelings of the people who were subjected to the law. It was proved before the Select Committee which last inquired into this subject that vaccinators were sometimes careless; that diseases of the most loathsome character were sometimes introduced into the system by the process of vaccination; and it should not be forgotten that some of the vaccine matter now used had been passing from arm to arm and from system to system for 70 years, for nearly all the matter used was derived from that which Jenner first obtained from animals. Was it surprising, in these circumstances, that some people should have a deep-rooted and conscientious objection to the vaccination of their children? For his own part, he was not disposed to counsel people to submit passively to laws which in their hearts they thoroughly disapproved, especially when their conscience and their health were concerned. The case was eminently one for inquiry. At present, although the information we possessed on the subject was limited, magistrates set themselves to enforce the law in something like passion, being apparently resolved to make the unhappy persons who objected and were brought before them bend submissively to the yoke at any cost; and the country had seen the illegal spectacle of the Chairman of a Board of Guardians directing a prosecution and afterwards himself sitting on the bench of magistrates to try the case. In one case which had come to his knowledge it was said that a man had been summoned for vaccination offences no fewer than 44 times since the year 1870, and another had been prosecuted 16 times. He regretted that the Registrar General had taken up so pronounced a position on the question, because his doing so was calculated to throw doubt on his impartiality. He contended that the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) should stand as part of the original Motion of the noble Lord, and he hoped that it would be carried.

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH observed that the debate had travelled over a wide field, and he felt himself placed in a position of some embarrassment, inasmuch as his noble Friend who brought forward the Motion had stated at the outset that he was in favour of compulsory vaccination; but the Mover of the Amendment had laid down propositions and doctrines entirely antagonistic to those which his noble Friend had advanced. Dealing first with the Motion, he must, however, say that his noble Friend had produced no evidence whatever to substantiate the accusations which he had preferred against the practice of compulsory vaccination in this country. He had adduced no names of physicians, no authority whatever for his imputations against that practice. His noble Friend stated that vaccination was unpopular among large classes of the people. No doubt compulsory interference between parent and child might be unpopular, but Parliament had decided that such interference was required in the public interest; and the medical testimony on which the Act was based was accepted by the great mass of medical men, not only in this Kingdom, but in Christendom. His noble Friend assumed that the lymph now in use among the doctors of this country had lost its efficacy; but he did not say on what foundation that assumption rested. [Earl PERCY: On statistics.] His noble Friend had adduced statistics with the view of showing that small-pox was now more prevalent and more fatal than in times past, and he could not now undertake to follow him with statistics which might be brought forward in opposition to that allegation. He knew, however, that in the last century 1-14th of the whole deaths in the Kingdom arose from small-pox; that asylums were filled with persons who had been blinded or crippled by the disease; and that one-fifth of our soldiers and Militia then suffered more or less from the results of its ravages. He thought he need not undertake at this time of day to prove what he believed was an admitted proposition—not only in the House but in the country—that small-pox was held in check by the system of vaccination. The noble Lord had not convinced him that he had any authority for making his statements to the contrary. The noble Lord assumed that vaccination from the cow would produce more satisfactory results, and would, in fact, enable us to enforce vaccination in a way that he thought would be justifiable. Well he (Mr. Sclater-Booth) could only say in reply to that statement that although the greater part of the lymph now in use in this country had been derived from the Jennerian stock the Vaccination Establishments never neglected an opportunity when it presented itself of introducing new stocks of lymph, and one of the establishments in London was supplied almost entirely from new stocks derived direct from the animal a few years ago. The noble Lord was, therefore, quite in error in assuming that the whole of the vaccine matter in use in this country was worn out by reason of lapse of time. Then they had had some experience of the validity and satisfactory character of the new stocks of lymph. The results were extremely satisfactory, but not more satisfactory than those obtained at any of the other vaccine stations where the old stocks were used. Again, he must say when his noble Friend had asked for inquiry, that it was only in 1869 that Dr. Seaton, on behalf of the Government, made a personal investigation into the condition of animal lymph in Belgium, France, and Holland, and the result of his investigation was to be found in a most elaborate report, which he (Mr. Sclater-Booth) then held in his hand, and which he recommended to the study of hon. Members who took an interest in the subject. Very interesting experiments had been made with regard to lymph, and he did not at all wish to deprecate the continuance of experiments. On the contrary, he had had many communications with the medical officer on the subject, and that gentleman had assured him that he was willing and ready at all times to make experiments and follow the lights which modern science might throw upon the subject. So late as 1875 the French physicians discontinued the use of vaccine matter direct from the animal, having found that it produced no better results than those produced by the ordinary lymph, while the effects appeared to be much more uncertain. With regard to the wide-spread feeling that was said to exist among the public in reference to the operation of the present system, he was not aware that there was evidence to show that such a widespread feeling did exist, although no doubt additional interest had been awakened by the recent outbreak of small-pox; and he had no reason to suppose that there was any foundation for it in the minds of medical men of authority. He was quite willing, however, to assure his noble Friend that the attention of the medical officers of his Department would be continually directed to this subject, and that the Government would spare no expense either to continue experiments, or to make fresh ones, or to send out gentlemen to make inquiries such as were made a few years ago with the view of ascertaining the most recent practice and experience on the subject. Meanwhile, the information before him did not lead him to suppose that the mischief which was supposed to arise from the practice of vaccination as at present pursued would be at all cured by the new species of vaccine recommended. The hon. Member who seconded the Motion (Mr. Greene) had used arguments which he (Mr. Sclater-Booth) thought were contradictory of each other. He repeated the complaint that in the course of years the vaccine matter had become effete; but, on the other hand, he stated in the most unqualified terms that the nurses in the London Hospital, who had been subjected to the most frightful chances of catching the disease, had been secured against it by the process of re-vaccination. If the vaccine matter employed in those hospitals had been effete, as described, how was it possible that those extraordinary results could have followed? But he did not understand that the efficacy of vaccination was the point now in question. Upon that all seemed to be agreed. He was in constant communication with the chairmen and managers of the metropolitan district hospitals, and he had been informed by skilful medical men that there was no reason whatever to believe that small-pox had lost either its virulency or its epidemic effect, or that it was less kept in check than heretofore by the practice of vaccination. Certain it was that though the number of deaths arising from small-pox during the past Autumn and Spring had not been great compared with deaths from the same cause in previous epidemics, the character of the disease was as loathsome as could possibly be conceived. Although the practice of vaccination might be open to some observation, it was a provision with regard to the health of the community which it would be criminal on the part of those in authority to ignore. The noble Lord being desirous not of upsetting the vaccination laws, but, on the contrary, of enforcing them with a stringency which he himself should scarcely be inclined to advocate, had suggested that animal lymph should be used in vaccination. The hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) having failed in obtaining a second reading for his Bill, which he regretted, had now moved an Amendment to the effect that the inquiry proposed by the noble Lord should be extended to the subject of the expediency of continuing the accumulative penalties against those who were guilty of a breach of the law on this subject. It was quite true, as the hon. Member stated, that a Select Committee of the House of Commons which sat in 1871 had recommended among other things that no penalty beyond the second should be enforced against those who persisted in breaking the law. Various other suggestions had been made, some of which were plausible, and others of which were reasonable, by which the difficulty with regard to these accumulative penalties for the same offence, which he admitted were without parallel in our law, might be avoided. These suggestions were doubtless worthy of consideration; but the main difficulty was that those who objected to vaccination denounced them all, and they would even eschew the proposition of the hon. Member (Mr. Pease). The fact was that the feeling of some of the persons who were opposed to vaccination approached that of religious conviction, and such persons would repudiate all the suggestions which had been made as unworthy of consideration by anti-vaccinationists. But, he must ask, was Parliament prepared to go the length of abrogating all the laws upon this subject? That was the difficulty in which he found himself placed. When first he acceded to the office he now held he found existing among certain classes a feeling on the subject which commended itself to his sympathies as pointing to an anomaly in the existing law; and it was in the hope of mitigating the hardships of that law that a measure was passed through Parliament in 1874 with the view of enabling the Local Government Board to make rules and regulations as to the way in which the law should be enforced. It had been suggested that something further ought to be done towards putting a stop to the infliction of repeated penalties for the same offence; but it was difficult to know where to be peremptory and where to leave a discretion to the local authorities. As long as these laws remained in force it appeared to him to be absolutely necessary to leave it to the discretion of the prosecuting authority to say whether it was for the advantage of the community that these penalties should be enforced or not. He thought that he had sufficiently indicated the feeling of the Government that these repeated prosecutions should not be lightly undertaken. He, however, was not prepared to say that in districts where the Anti-Vaccination Society had interfered unduly to prevent the wholesome operation of the law that the Guardians were not justified in instituting these prosecutions and the magistrates were not justified in convicting and enforcing the penalties. He had repeatedly had his attention called to the subject, and he should have been glad to ask Parliament again, if he saw his way, to consider it; but, as he had stated before in answer to Questions, he doubted whether the Government could carry through Parliament a Bill which would have the effect of cutting down those penalties and breaking down the stringency of the existing law. At this stage of the Session it was not possible for the Government to propose any alteration in the law during the present year; but whether it might be possible in future years to propose legislation to meet the views of hon. Members opposite, he could not say. It was perfectly true that Mr. Simon was never in favour of the cumulative penalties. The difficulty was to avoid, in any change of the law, breaking down the securities which the law now gave. They did not know what an outburst of feeling of dissatisfaction would be encountered if any Government attempted to comply with the requirements of the Anti-Vaccination Society. At the same time the Government did not undervalue the objections of ignorant people, who naturally disliked interference between themselves and their children for an object which they did not appreciate, and which, nevertheless, they owed to the whole community to permit to be performed. Then it was stated that other diseases were propagated by the system; but he would say that out of the many millions of operations which had been performed since the inquiry of 1871 they had not found a single allegation of this kind which did not break down upon inquiry. He would not say that there were not cases in which the operation was performed at improper times, and that erysipelas was not occasionally induced by vaccination, as it was by any other wound; but the greatest pains were always taken to investigate these cases, and he had never hesitated to follow them up and to remove vaccination officers who were proved to have improperly performed their duties. Still, he could not say that these complaints were frequent, or that when investigated they were often found to be otherwise than groundless. Something had been said as to the fact that the Government Department did not supply pure lymph to every practitioner and for all vaccinations.

answer to this was simply that the department were only bound to supply to public vaccinators and for many vaccinations, for which operators they were alone responsible. The number of deaths from small-pox in the present epidemic had been very greatly reduced. He thought it could not be much deprecated that the House of Commons, at a time like the present, should come to any Resolutions which would imply that they had any doubt as to the need of a universal system of vaccination.

R. W. E. FORSTER said, he had read the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman with great pleasure. He was quite aware of the difficult position in which the right hon. Gentleman was placed, having to administer a very stringent compulsory Act which affronted the feelings of many parents, while at the same time he was obliged to administer it in order to guard against one of the most terrible disorders. He trusted the noble Lord would be content with the manner in which the Motion had been met by the right hon. Gentleman, and that he would not press it to a division. It was asked that inquiry should be made into the working of the Vaccination Acts; but the inquiry was being constantly made, as he knew by experience, by the able men who were at the head of the Veterinary Department. For the House to decide that there should be further inquiry would be to tell the country that the House of Commons had great doubt whether vaccination was satisfactorily conducted. That would be a most dangerous step to take. He had also heard the right hon. Gentleman's remarks in reference to the Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. Selator-Booth) with great pleasure, for the principle of that Amendment he did not oppose. For his part, he heartily supported the Amendment. It had been his duty to sit over a Committee which inquired into the entire subject and to draw up a Report, and afterwards to introduce a Bill to give effect to that Report; but he could not but remember that a provision of that Bill similar to the Amendment was struck out by a small majority in "another place." He should be sorry to say a word against the principle of compulsory vaccination. His reason for supporting the Amendment was that he believed it would enable vaccination compulsory. If they were to say that parents must have their children vaccinated, parents would ask why they were not vaccinated themselves. It was always better to be vaccinated than to be diseased, as it was the responsibility of the State to see that there were three things to consider: first, that the disease was not neglected; secondly, that the disease was not spread; and thirdly, that the disease was not prevented. He was opposed to the Amendment, but he thought, before he did so, he should first of all consider the class of people who could do without vaccination. He thought that people who were not vaccinated with such a disease as small-pox were a great danger to the community. He thought that the Government should go further and make vaccination compulsory for all classes of people. He thought that the Government might be able to let these people work for the law for the rich? The Government were determined to enforce it. His right hon. Friend who was the child of the office to be a Friend knew to work at the penalty could escape was not a good thing. He could not be vaccinated at all. He was vaccinated at a year. He was forced to vaccinate of the rich rather than of the poor. He was anti-vaccination. He was anti-right hon. He was anti-alteration. He was anti-those who were to vaccinate who cared to satisfy the Government. He wanted to see that the Government stood a few minutes with such a disease as small-pox. He was idle and he was a danger to the nation and he was a right hon. He might be cedents in his favour. No one knew more about the subject than Mr. Simon, and the Select Committee, which was at first prejudiced, after a careful inquiry of several weeks unanimously determined to recommend the amendment to which he alluded. This decision was fully confirmed by this House.

Mr. WALTER said, he had the misfortune to have one or two constituents who thought they had been persecuted in regard to the vaccination of their children, and it had been his duty to reply to the communications they had addressed to him. He rather regretted that his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) had not entered into greater detail so as to explain more precisely in what way he would meet these cases, because his remarks did not supply him with a satisfactory answer to these constituents. He should like to know to what extent his right hon. Friend would go in carrying out what appeared to be a dispensation against obeying the law. This appeared to him to be a very dangerous principle to admit—that a pecuniary penalty should relieve a person from the obligation of obeying a law passed for the benefit of the community. A good deal might, no doubt, be said in favour of the doctrine that there should be in certain cases a maximum beyond which penalties should not be inflicted; but would his right hon. Friend apply the same doctrine in other cases—to education, for instance? There was, he believed, no limit to the pecuniary penalties to which a parent was now liable who neglected to send his child to school, and would his right hon. Friend apply any limit to the penalties that might be imposed on these parents?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, that there was a liability to imprisonment in the one case and not in the other.

Mr. WALTER could not see that this was a defensible distinction. There were again penalties under the Cattle Plague Act imposed upon those who removed their cattle against the law, and he presumed that those penalties, however severe they might be, were also cumulative. There ought to be some general rule. He wished to mention the way in which this difficult case—for it was a very difficult case—was met in another country, the most allied to our own in its institutions—he meant the United States. Last year, when he was in America, he took particular pains to find out what the laws were with regard to vaccination, and he found there was no compulsory vaccination whatever—that was to say, no direct compulsion. The consequence was that in some places, like Cincinnati, where there was a large German community who had strong objections to vaccination, the small-pox, when it came, made frightful ravages. The way in which the matter was dealt with there was this—they did not by law compel people to be vaccinated, but they did not admit to school any child who had not been vaccinated. Now that we had national education, conducted under a more or less compulsory system, he would ask whether there might not be a rule laid down that no child should be admitted to an elementary school who had not been vaccinated? He had been informed by an authority which he had no reason to doubt that that was the general, if not the universal, rule in the United States. If a similar rule were adopted in this country it might have the effect of an indirect compulsion, without the more stringent and disagreeable penalties by which alone compulsory vaccination could be enforced.

EARL PERCY said, that he had been urged not to divide the House; but the right hon. Gentleman said that he had established no case, and if he did not divide it would be admitting the charge. Either the lymph was in a useless condition or vaccination was not a sufficient remedy. Cow-pox was not an uncommon disease in cows. He would take a division on his own Motion, assenting to the Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. Pease).

THE CONFESSIONAL.—RESOLUTION.

MR. WHALLEY moved—

“That, having regard to the state of the Law which renders the publication of an obscene book an offence, although the person publishing it be not actuated by any desire to deprave, and to the absence of any power in the Education Department to interfere with the religious teaching in public elementary schools or to make any inquiry thereon, this House is of opinion that the doctrines and practices set forth in a book entitled 'The Priest in Absolution,' and carried out under the name of the Confessional by certain clergymen of the Church of England, do tend to deprave and are dangerous to the best interests of society and of religion."

MR. MONK seconded the Motion.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS had only remarked that he had not seen the book and had not been able to procure a copy, when——

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

(Mr. O'Sullivan, Captain Nolan, Mr. Richard Power, Mr. O'Byrne.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. O'SULLIVAN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he did so simply for the reasons denoted by the title of the Bill, for the better administration of justice at Petty Sessions Courts in Ireland. He assured the House that never was there a Bill brought before it which would do more to give the working classes in Ireland confidence in the administration of the law in Petty Sessions Courts than the Bill which he was moving for second reading, and he could also assure the Government that the people had not confidence in those Courts as at present constituted, for very good reasons. There were, no doubt, many good and faithful magistrates in Ireland; but, at the same time, there were still a large number who did not bring credit to the Bench. The local magistrates represented the landlords throughout the country, with very few exceptions; the stipendiary magistrates represented the Government, and there was no one to represent the ratepayers and the people. Hon. Members, he was satisfied, would see that that was a state of things which required some improvement, particularly in a country like Ireland, where the majority of the landlords differed from the great mass of the people in class, in religion, and in politics; but that would be passed over, if the laws were administered on equal terms to all. He maintained, without fear of contradiction, that in one-half the Petty Session cases in Ireland the law was not administered as it should be. And the consequence was, there was more disaffection created in Petty Sessions Courts in Ireland than in all the other Courts in the country. He proposed to give the power to the ratepayers of electing one magistrate for each Union in Ireland. Among those ratepayers he had included every landlord who would register his claim to vote, as at present, in the election of Poor Law Guardians, but for one vote only. He was not going to interfere with, or deprive the Lord Chancellor of, the power he at present enjoyed in the case of the other magistrates, that of refusing to sanction any magistrate who, he thought, was unfit for the position, or to remove any magistrate whose acts were such as to unfit him for so responsible a position. He proposed that the person elected should retain office for five years, and be eligible for re-election, and that the Chairman of each Union should act as returning officer, to save expense; and that the votes should be taken by Ballot, the same as at Parliamentary and municipal elections. Those were the different clauses of the Bill, and hon. Members would see it was very short, and he hoped satisfactory. It might be said he was introducing a new law into the country in giving the nomination of magistrates into the hands of the people. He was not introducing a new law in the Bill; but he was asking the House to extend a privilege to the county ratepayers which was at present enjoyed by many towns and by all the cities and boroughs in Ireland. The mayors of all the cities and towns in Ireland were invested with the commission of the peace. The commission of the peace was also given to the Chairman of the Commissioners of 22 or 24 towns in Ireland, and all he asked was to extend that privilege to the ratepayers of each Union. Some hon. Members might oppose the Bill on the ground that elected magistrates in America were not all that magistrates should be; but it might as well be argued that the system by which the Members of that House were elected should be abolished, because some of the Senators in America were supposed to have acted corruptly. He appealed to the House, in the interests of justice, to pass the Bill, and he promised them that the working of it would be so satisfactory that the House would feel pleased that they gave this liberty to the people. The Bill, as he had said, was simply to transfer the nomination of one magistrate in each Union in Ireland from the Lieutenant of the county to the ratepayers of the Union. It did not interfere with the present power of any person. It left the Lord Chancellor the power of rejecting the candidate elected by the people, if he considered him unsuitable. If it was opposed on the broad ground of election by the people, then he should regret the constitution of that House, which was composed of those sent by the people. Then, again, they had the coroners, a body who held a very responsible position, elected by the people, and many Boards in Ireland were also elected in the same way. The Irish were a justice-loving people, and the House might be confident they would elect none but men who would discharge their duty above board, and without fear, favour, or affection. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. O'Sullivan.)

MR. DE LA POER BERESFORD, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said, he did so, believing that it was quite unnecessary for the administration of justice in Ireland. In Armagh, there were already 85 magistrates to a population of 180,000. In Cavan, which he knew, perhaps, better than any other Member of that House, there were 85 persons in the commission of the peace to a population of 140,000. In Fermanagh, there were 71 magistrates to a population of 92,000; and in Monaghan there were 61 to a population of 114,000, and he could not see how it would promote the administration of justice to admit two or three persons chosen from amongst the Poor Law Guardians of each county. In Cavan there were certainly four Unions, and in Fermanagh and Leitrim there were three; but in most of the counties, there were only two. Already the number of magistrates was quite sufficient for the due administration of justice, and he had never heard any complaint as to their decisions, though he was certain, from his knowledge of the people, and moving among them as he did, to hear of any legal decision which was considered faulty. In fact, he believed that the people were entirely satisfied with the commission of the peace as it was at present constituted. In addition to the local magistrates there were a number of stipendiary magistrates appointed by and responsible to a great extent to the Government, and they attended the Petty Sessions regularly, and were gentlemen of all shades of opinion. In some parts of the country they belonged to one political side, and in another to another; and such being the case the people had as much confidence in them as they had in the local magistrates. There was certainly a recent very remarkable case, in which the proceedings of a magistrate in Ireland were questioned; but it was the only case of the kind that he knew of, and if the decisions of the local magistrates in Sessions Courts did not meet with the approval of the people, it would soon be brought to the knowledge of the House. The Bill would change the whole system of the appointment of magistrates in Ireland, and if it were to become law, as he was perfectly certain it would not, a demand would be made that the whole of the magistrates should be appointed by the people. The Poor Law Guardians of Ireland were entitled to the greatest respect; but they were not qualified for the magisterial bench, and he opposed the Bill, being of opinion that it would not confer the slightest benefit upon any portion of the community. The Irish magistracy would compare favourably with the magistracy of Scotland, or of England; but if the Bill were to pass there would be a number of men appointed from the Poor Law Guardians who would be supposed to teach law to those already in the commission of the peace. It would be casting a slur upon the whole bench of magistrates, both local and resident, and, therefore, upon the grounds he had stated, he would move its rejection.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. De La Poer Beresford.)

CAPTAIN NOLAN, in supporting the Bill, could only say that the counties to which the previous speaker (Mr. De la Poer Beresford) had referred were very fortunate, if the decision of their magistrates had been free from complaint. He did not wish to make out that the magistrates of Ireland were very bad, or worse than English magistrates; but the whole circumstances of the case in Ireland were different from that of England, and he only abstained from giving instances of complaints because it would be getting into troubled waters, and departing from the line of argument adopted by the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan). In former times a number of the judicial officers in Greece and Rome were chosen by the people; and, in the present day, in some parts of the United States, in parts of Canada, he believed, and in Russia the magistrates were elected. The same principle was also adopted in France up to the date of the Restoration, so that England was an exception to the general rule, which gave a certain amount of local power to the people in the appointment of judicial officers. As a general rule the property of Ireland was held by Protestants, while the great mass of the people were Catholics, and it was a source of dissatisfaction that the result of this state of things was to give a large numerical preponderance in the magistracy to Protestants. The present system gave a good deal of political influence to Lords Lieutenant, upon whom the Bill would act as a wholesome check. The power of reversing appointments to the commission of the peace was, no doubt, vested in the Lord Chancellor; but that power was very little exercised, and when the Lord Chancellor happened to be a Conservative, people were slow to ask him to interfere with appointments made by a Conservative Lord Lieutenant. The Bill would not do everything; but it would do a great deal of good. It was a very modest attempt to remedy existing evils; and, perhaps, when it got into Committee, he should feel it his duty to propose that the appointments should be rather more in number than the Bill provided for, and that they should be for a longer term than five years. The Poor Law Guardians were perhaps not all fit to be magistrates; but it was not asked to make them all magistrates; and in every Poor Law Union there would, no doubt, be found a man who from his education and practical knowledge of the state of the country, would be quite as fit to sit upon the Bench as some of those to whom the administration of justice was at present entrusted. The present system acted unfairly to the commercial classes by shutting out the enterprising man, who had made a fortune by his industry and energy, from a position to which his son, though perhaps of very inferior ability and energy, would be eligible by inheriting the land purchased with his father's wealth. In some cases the popular nomination might fall upon a man of the commercial class, and much advantage would result from such an appointment; and at other times a landed proprietor might be elected whose qualifications were now overlooked by the Lord Lieutenant. There was ample control over the abuse of the power of election; for the Lord Chancellor, under the Bill, would have a right to refuse the appointment of any man without being required to assign any reason whatever. It had been urged as a reproach to the people of Ireland that they had no respect for the law; but if this were true, there was every reason for it. Until 80 or 90 years ago the people enjoyed no power of election whatever. It was the policy at one time for the English Government to attempt to crush out all popular organizations, and in the smaller towns people did not elect their town councils and corporations. Only within the last 10 or 12 years had these elections in the small towns been revived, and very good effects had followed the election of Town Commissioners. Local questions were now discussed in a reasonable manner. So also this Bill was a step towards bringing the people into association with law, and by that means there would be a gradual respect for the magistracy as a body not altogether selected from the aristocratic class. That the people, he argued, should have no power to have a voice in selecting those by whom the law was administered involved not only a hardship, but a great anomaly, seeing that they were entrusted with the election of Members of Parliament by whom the laws were made.

Mr. VERNER said, he would not attempt to follow the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) throughout his elaborate speech. Before he came down to the House, he felt curious to know what arguments would be brought forward to support the Bill; for on looking through it, it seemed to him to consist of two or three propositions which the circumstances of the case did not at all warrant. Allusion had been made to the office of mayor as a precedent for the election of magistrates. It might be taken for granted, certainly, that the Lord Mayor acted as a magistrate while he held office; but when the case of Town Commissioners was cited, he (Mr. Verner) wished to point out that a Commissioner was not necessarily, by virtue of his position, a magistrate; and, in fact, it often happened that the Chairman of the Commissioners was not a magistrate, although in many cases the Lord Chancellor was recommended to, and did, make such appointments. He found very good reasons for not liking the Bill. They had had opportunities of seeing the effect of electing Judges and magistrates, and when the hon. and gallant Gentleman enlarged upon the special precedents of America and of Russia, he could not point to any beneficial results, and made out but a weak case. They did not in this country want that "thorough democracy" which existed in America, and just as little did they want the order of things found in Russia. The hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan), in supporting the principle of the Bill, urged that if it was objected to, they might as well object to popular election of Members of Parliament. He said the House might as well be abolished, because it was popularly elected. Well, hon. Members had had an instance lately of the effects of extreme popular election as regarded the House of Commons, and he believed they were not much enamoured of it. One argument brought forward by the promoters of the Bill was that there were not enough Roman Catholics in the magistracy. If that principle went for anything, it meant that the lower orders of the people had an idea that if a Roman Catholic magistrate were elected, he would have a bias towards them. He (Mr. Verner) could not see that that would conduce towards upholding the administration of justice in Ireland, that people should think that any magistrate on the bench should have an inclination towards any particular religion. Such an idea must tend to degrade justice in the eyes of the people. Other features of the Bill also would altogether disorganize the proper state of things in Ireland. The Lord Chancellor would no doubt have absolute power to put any election aside; but he would ask the House to imagine what a turmoil and discontent there would be if the Lord Chancellor exercised his authority, and disregarded the elected of the people. The appointment was to last for five years only, and any one ordinarily cognizant with human nature would know that a man once elected to the Bench would like to continue there, so that during those five years he would court the favourable opinion of those who elected him; and, certainly, the canvassing in the Unions would be attended with every possible evil effect. Another proposition was, that the expenses of the elections should be paid out of the rates, and that the officials of the Poor Law Union should be employed in conducting elections. To that he objected, that there was a general outcry against the burdens thrown upon the rates in Ireland, and when occasion offered, no Gentlemen were more ready to join in that cry than the hon. Members supporting the Bill. It was a very just complaint also, that multifarious duties were thrust upon the Poor Law officials which it was never intended their shoulders should bear. Such a Bill as this would still further divert the attention of the officials from their proper duties, and divert the rates from the objects for which they were raised. He joined his hon. Friend (Mr. De la Poer Beresford) in his opposition, and he hoped the Bill would be scouted out of the House.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING thought the Bill an unpretending one. It would only have the effect of making a very small addition to the existing number of magistrates, and the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Verner) had grounded his objection on false premises, for his (Mr. Downing's) hon. Friend (Mr. O'Sullivan) had founded the merits of the Bill, not on any desire to cast reflection on the magistrates of Ireland, or even on the necessity of adding to the number of justices, though he might fairly have done so, but he said—"We wish by this proposal to give the people a share, through their representatives, in the administration of justice." There were precedents in favour of such a course. The hon. Member for Armagh was in error in supposing that the power of appointing Town Commissioners as magistrates was vested in the Lord Lieutenant. The power of selection was in the Commissioners as a body, and the name being transmitted to the Lord Chancellor, he was then appointed by the Lord Chancellor's warrant. Those appointed to the town councils were exactly the same class as were appointed to the Boards of Guardians, and, in fact, were sometimes members of both bodies. When the disturbing element of election was referred to, it should be remembered that it occurred now every 25th of March, when the chairman, vice chairman, and deputy chairman were elected. These were often elected from the elected Board of Guardians, and if fit to preside over 20 or 30 ex officio educated gentlemen, intelligent farmers, and shopkeepers, surely they were quite fit to sit upon the Bench. No objection could be taken to the number of the magistracy, for, at present, they were in the proportion of one to every 20,000 of the population in some districts, and the addition of four to the 85 in Cavan would be but small. In the progress of election, however, the Bill might be amended. For his own part, he should prefer that the magistrate should be elected by the Board of Guardians. The ratepayers having, in that Board, elected their best men, they again would elect the best man among themselves. As to the introduction of religious bias, he thought that an hon. Member from the North of Ireland should be the last to say anything about that.

MR. BRUEN said, that if the precedent just cited were followed, the Bill now under consideration could not pass, because it provided for the election of magistrates by the popular vote of the ratepayers. He wished to show what would be the effect of the Bill. We had had some remarkable examples in popular elections within the last few years. Take, for example, the county of Tipperary. The qualifications for the election of Members of Parliament were not now so low as this Bill proposed to give; but some years ago, the constituency returned as their Member O'Donovan Rossa. He was elected by a large majority. If this Bill had then been law, and seeing that the franchise for elections to Boards of Guardians was lower than that for Parliamentary Elections, the result of an election in that county, with the then existing popular feeling, would have been that men defying the law would have been elected to sit on the Bench to carry out the law. To such a preposterous result would this Bill lead. Later very much the same thing took place in the election of John Mitchel. He believed the existing system was one of moderation between two extremes, and although the election of magistrates by popular vote was not part of our Constitution, yet the system by which they were appointed did not keep out of view popular interests and popular wishes. He did not think we ought to go to America for an example, or import into Ireland the despotic system of Russia. In the latter country, it should be remembered, popular elections were very different things from what they were here. It was new to him that the administration of justice in Ireland generally did not carry with it popular confidence, and that the number of magistrates appointed in Ireland did not bear a numerical proportion of Protestants to Roman Catholics. It was to him a most painful thing that the religious argument should have been imported into the question, for there was a general desire throughout the country that the difference of religion should be kept within as narrow limits as possible, and it was unfortunate that it had been brought forward. They should give credit to all for purity of purpose when sitting on the bench of justice. Too often these differences had been used for agitation, although he did not for a moment accuse the hon. and gallant Member for Galway of so using the argument. He (Mr. Bruen) deprecated the introduction of canvassing for a seat on the Bench, and for a candidate to have to pledge himself to follow a particular line of conduct. He opposed the Bill, and trusted the House would, by its decision, declare, first, that the accusation brought by it against the administration of justice in Ireland was unfounded; next, that the present mode of appointing magistrates was a fair one, and that the interests of all classes were sufficiently attended to, and that the change proposed would be a most dangerous one.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that he intended to support the second reading, and he did not wish to give a silent vote. He submitted that the people of Ireland did not feel the same confidence of justice in Petty Sessions as there was in County Courts and Supreme Courts. He did not mean to state that there were not some most excellent magistrates in that country, but what he desired was to see more confidence in those Courts. The principle of the Bill was not without precedents. Such a judicial office as that of coroner was filled by popular election, and the aldermen of the City of London were elected; so, also, in Scotland, he believed that many seats among the magistracy were filled by election. The Bill was a small one, and did not propose to do more than add one magistrate to each Union. The mode of election, he agreed with the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Downing), should be through the Board of Guardians, and not direct from the ratepayers; but that was a detail, and it was only the principle of the Bill they now had to deal with. With regard to the remarks of the last speaker (Mr. Bruen) it would be impossible that, had the Bill been law, either O'Donovan Rossa or Mr. John Mitchel could have been elected, for neither were qualified. Besides, the Lord Chancellor would have full power under the Bill to prevent any improper appointment.

MR. COGAN said, that although he was of opinion that there might be some improvement made in reference to the appointment of magistrates in Ireland, yet he could not give his concurrence to this Bill. He believed it would be impossible to adopt a more vicious principle than that of making popular favour or disfavour a reason for the election or non-election of a magistrate. He should be sorry to see the magistrates and Judges in his country elected under the influences resorted to in the United States. In that respect, he should be very sorry to assist in Americanizing our institutions, as it would be a change for the worse. It was admitted by all, even by those most favourable to the Republican system in the United States, that the popular election of those discharging judicial duties, was the great blot on the system, and would prove fatal to the best interests of the country, if allowed to continue. The Bill contained another objectionable principle in regard to the term of office—five years and no longer—unless re-elected. This was more vicious even than the original popular vote for selection in the first instance; it would be a fatal revolution, destroying the great principle that those discharging judicial duties—which must in their nature be often unpopular—should hold office during good behaviour, and not be liable to removal either by public caprice or the displeasure either of the Government or the Crown. Such a system would be a scandal to the seat of justice. He should vote against the second reading, because the Bill, if carried, would materially lower the character and imperil the independence of the magistrates of Ireland.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he could not, on behalf of the Government, assent to the second reading of the Bill, which was one proposing an entirely new system of appointing justices. What was the evil that the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan) proposed to remedy by the Bill? He thought the hon. Gentleman was under some mistake as to the practice under which borough magistrates were now appointed, because there was no analogy between that practice and the method proposed under this Bill. Borough justices were appointed in England, as in Ireland, with the exception of the unreformed Corporation of the City of London, solely by the Crown. Mayors under statute exercised the functions of justices; but that was a very different thing indeed from the election of a person for magisterial duties only by the ratepayers. The appointment of justices in towns under the 17th & 18th Vict., called the Towns Improvement Act, had been referred to, but that again was not analogous to anything proposed in the Bill. Under that Act a list of the Commissioners elected was submitted to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland for the time being, stating the ages, professions, &c., of the persons elected, and it was lawful for the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, if he saw fit, to select from that list persons as justices for towns. The persons so selected were only appointed magistrates during their term of office, and only had jurisdiction within the boundaries of the towns for which they were elected Town Commissioners, and then only so long as the Lord Chancellor thought fit. He wished to point out that that gave entire discretion as to the appointment of persons to be justices to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. But what was the principle of the Bill now before the House? The principle was that justices should be elected by the ratepayers of the Unions. The ratepayers of the Union were to elect the persons as justices, not for their Union alone, but for the whole county. The persons so elected were to hold their office for five years; there again differing from any magistrates now existing. This Bill had been recommended by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Downing) and the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) as a simple and modest attempt to alter the law. He was bound to say that to his mind it was a proposal to initiate a most important change—perhaps, one of the most important changes that could be conceived—in the judicial constitution of the country. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had gone, as he had done on former occasions, to foreign countries for examples, and had drawn his arguments in support of the Bill from the system adopted under a pure democracy in America and under a complete despotism in Russia. He did not wish to dilate upon the merits or faults of the form of Government in either of these countries; but he ventured to say that there was nothing in the judicial administration of the law there which would justify us for a moment in going to either of them for an example. They heard sometimes a great deal said about the unfair action of the Government in the appointment of justices; but that opinion, at any rate, did not appear to be shared by the promoters of the Bill, because under the present measure they left to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland the same veto which he now had over the recommendations of Lords Lieutenant of counties. The magistrates to be appointed were to be recommended to the Lord Chancellor by the ratepayers; they were now recommended to the Lord Chancellor by the Lords Lieutenant. He might say, in passing, that he thought there was some ground for doubting how far this measure had been thoroughly considered by its promoters, when they found such important differences between those who supported it as, on the one hand, the strong opinion in favour of election by the ratepayers, and, on the other hand, the preference expressed for election by the Guardians themselves. These were two very different matters, and upon that he might say that if the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan) had intended to follow any system now existing, he certainly never had any right to incorporate the election by the ratepayers in the Bill. One defect in the Bill was, that it contained no Proviso defining any qualification for persons to be appointed. In its present form a person might be resident in America, but, notwithstanding that, he might be elected a justice by the ratepayers of Limerick or Tipperary; therefore O'Donovan Rossa and John

Mitchel would have been eligible if this measure had been the law of the land. So far as he could understand, it seemed to him that the measure was an attack upon the Lieutenants of counties, and in connection with the point he had listened with great pleasure to the disclaimer of his hon. Friend the Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen) of any wish to treat this subject from a religious point of view. He believed that the Lieutenants of counties in Ireland, varying as they did in their religious and political opinions, exercised their privilege in the appointment of magistrates with fairness and discretion. But the magistrates must and ought to be selected from persons of education and leisure, irrespectively of their connection with any particular religious Body. If they simply took account of the persons in the community who were possessed of those qualifications, the necessary result would be, under present circumstances, a large preponderance of Protestant magistrates. ["No, no!"] He scarcely understood, indeed, how this Bill could be supported on religious grounds. He believed that under such a system it would too often be proved to be impossible for a Catholic to be elected as magistrate in a county where there was a large majority of Protestants, or a Protestant elected in a county where there was a Catholic majority. ["No, no!"] Well, they had an opportunity of seeing to what extent Party and religious feelings could influence persons in such matters, in the mode in which appointments by corporations and other public bodies were too often filled up; he feared that in every case in those parts of Ireland, if there was any truth in the arguments of hon. Gentlemen opposite, where the majority required protection, it would be just in those very places that the magistrate representing the opinions of the minority would have no chance whatever of election. He ventured to say that the present system, whatever its faults, was, at any rate, better than the system proposed to be substituted for it. Complaint had been made that the appointments of magistrates were too much confined to landowners. He thought that it was quite right and proper for the Lieutenants of counties to select men who had made their fortunes in commercial pursuits. But when he remembered questions which had been asked of him during the past Session, with regard to the bankruptcy of a certain magistrate, he felt that although the Lieutenants of counties might have to the best of their judgment recommended such persons to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, it was by no means unlikely that circumstances might subsequently arise, which would cause the Lieutenant to be much blamed for his recommendation. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway had appeared to think that the removal of Roman Catholic disabilities, which had been long ago effected, was an argument for this change. With that view he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) could not coincide; and he trusted the House would by their vote that day repudiate any desire to accept or make any such change as was proposed by the Bill; and that if any fault was found in any particular instance in the appointment of magistrates in Ireland, it would be brought before the House, when it would be his duty to make such a reply as might be required by the circumstances of that particular case.

MR. CALLAN said, he was rather surprised to hear the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland give as his experience, that it would be impossible for a Protestant to be elected in a Catholic district, and vice versa. Did the right hon. Baronet know that in the Catholic city of Dublin, save under very exceptional circumstances, a Protestant was elected Lord Mayor in regular rotation to a Catholic; and that whilst in Cork, Limerick, and Waterford, Protestants were selected in due rotation, in the vaunted, enlightened town of Belfast a Catholic had never been elected mayor? The hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen) had stated that the charge that the local administration of justice did not command the confidence of the people was quite new to him, and had felt pained that such an element as the religious one should have been imported into the case — not for the purpose of justice, but, as he charged, for the purposes of agitation. Well, he (Mr. Callan) would not rest on his own private opinion against that of the hon. Member, but would refer the House to a letter of one who, though a Catholic, would not be accused of any partiality towards the Catholics of Ireland. He referred to the noble and learned Lord

"Unfortunately there are other places, especially in the North of Ireland, in which there is no representation, or a very inadequate representation, of Catholics, and in some cases of Presbyterians, amongst the local magistracy, and the result not unnaturally is the creation more or less of that distrust which the Commissioners describe as affecting the trial of Party questions, even by persons in whose honour, impartiality, and justice on all other occasions the people implicitly rely. Wherever it is fairly possible to prevent that unhappy result and take from the local tribunals the appearance of sectarian exclusiveness by the appointment to the commission of fit and competent magistrates in whom all the members of the community can place reliance, the Lord Chancellor thinks the appointment should undoubtedly take place."

He (Mr. Callan) felt confident that such a judicial expression of opinion would have much more weight than the private opinion of any hon. Member, however personally estimable. He was surprised to find the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Catholic county of Carlow so bitter an opponent of a Bill which afforded some chance of a Catholic being elected a magistrate for that county. Carlow, with a Catholic population of 45,000 out of a total of 51,000, with some 50 magistrates, had only two Catholic magistrates, and yet the Member for that county cried out—"Oh! the religious element should not be imported into the case; the Catholics don't complain." Well, he (Mr. Callan) hoped that when next the hon. Member appeared before his constituents, the Catholic people of Carlow would remember the attitude taken by the hon. Member. The right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary, too, had repudiated the idea that there was any partiality or partizanship shown in the appointments to the magistracy, and had taken upon himself to affirm on their behalf that the Lords Lieutenants of counties had "exercised their power of appointment with fairness and discretion." Whatever courage might be displayed in making such an assertion, there was a great lack of discretion, as the following statistics would show. Take the county of Donegal, for example, with a population of 218,000, of whom upwards of 165,000 were Catholics. There were only two Catholic magistrates out of 119. In Tyrone, with a Catholic population of 130,000, out of a total of 215,000, or more than half, there was not one single Catholic magistrate among the 120 justices of the peace. And it was from that county that the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary drew the instance to point an unworthy sneer at the merchant-traders of the country districts in Ireland. The 77,000 Catholics of Londonderry County, out of an entire population of 173,000, had but a solitary member of their community among the magistracy of that county, numbering over 106. He next came to his (Mr. Callan's) native county of Louth, of which Lord Rathdonnell was the Lieutenant. There were in that eminently Catholic county, with a population of upwards of 70,000, 64,000 Catholics, wealthy men of honour and education, equal in every respect to their Protestant neighbours. There were only eight resident Catholic magistrates out of some 47 or 48, or less than one-fifth of the whole, and this disparity arose not from any want of fully-qualified Catholics, but from the intense bigotry of the Lord Lieutenant of the county, who had persistently and determinedly refused to appoint a Catholic to the commission of the peace. In fact, the only 10 Catholics who had been appointed were not appointed until he (Mr. Callan) had brought the matter before the House in 1872. He would instance one case, and that only because the Gentleman in question was well known to many hon. Members, and esteemed by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance—his hon. Friend the junior Member for Louth (Mr. Kirk), who enjoyed the confidence of the people of his district, in which, Catholic to the core, there was not a single Catholic magistrate; and though his name had been prominently brought before Lord Rathdonnell, the Lord Lieutenant of the county, he would not appoint him to the commission of the peace. The right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary had made reference to borough magistrates. In the town which he (Mr. Callan) had the honour to represent (Dundalk), the Bench for years had been equally divided—three Catholics to three Protestants. Just before the General Election of 1868 one of the Catholic magistrates had died, and immediately after an application was made to have the borough magistrate appointed to the commission for the county, but that application was contemptuously rejected. And yet Mr. M'Ardle, the senior partner in the well-known firm of M'Ardle, Moore, and Co., in whose favour the application was made, had been then eleven times successively unanimously elected Chairman of the Dundalk Town Commissioners. He had during all that time acted as borough magistrate, with satisfaction to the authorities and to the public; had been recommended for the vacancy by the late venerated Primate of Ireland, by the borough Member, by the two Catholic magistrates on the Dundalk Bench, Messrs. Kelly and Coleman, by Lord Claremont, the brother of the then Chief Secretary for Ireland, and he (Mr. Callan) was authorized to state strongly by the resident magistrate, Captain Coate, a Tory of Tories, and by the chairman of the county, Mr. Neligan. He had also within the last two or three years been recommended by the Town Board; but the public recommendation had been treated with the same scant courtesy as had been the private one—namely, a curt refusal. He thanked the House for its courtesy and attention, and would go more fully into the subject on the Motion of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Fay) when it was discussed. The right hon. Baronet's objections were entirely directed to the details of the Bill. He (Mr. Callan) supported the Bill, though he was not much in favour of it, for he believed that if it passed in its present shape, the result would be that while the ratepayers in the Southern counties would elect Protestants almost sooner than Roman Catholics, there would not be the slightest chance of a Catholic being elected in the North.

Mr. O'DONNELL, in supporting the Bill, said, the hon. Members for Armagh (Mr. Verner) and Carlow (Mr. Bruen) deprecated the introduction of religious differences into this question, and the remedy they proposed was to entirely exclude Catholics. Of course this would be a fine way of excluding religious differences. It was said that the Bill introduced the American system; but he denied that, and the promoters of the Bill were prepared to accept Amendments even to the length of allowing the elections to be made by Boards of Guardians. The Bill was meant to apply a remedy to a prejudicial state of affairs existing now in the Irish judicial system, which was not regarded with satisfaction. Everywhere the appointments to the office of justices of the peace were found to correspond to territorial and caste distinctions. This fact would, in itself, if they had not abundant proofs of the magisterial misuse of functions, form a practical objection of the strongest kind to the continued maintenance of the present system. The objections that had been brought forward were mainly objections on matters of detail. With regard to the limitation of the duration of the power of the Union justices, the supporters of the Bill were not tied to a duration of 5 to 10 years. If hon. Gentlemen holding Conservative views preferred to make Union justices tenants of their offices for life, he did not think there would be any objection on the part of the supporters of the Bill. They were prepared to go any reasonable length to meet the objections of hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. All they asked was, that the present system of arbitrary and caste domination in Ireland might be amended to the very limited extent of allowing ratepayers or Boards of Guardians to choose a small number of magistrates as representatives of the most substantial and respectable portion of the community, in order to temper and correct the present system. They did not go any further than that, although he personally was inclined to go very much further, believing, as he did, that the only real objection to the Bill was, that it was a great deal too moderate.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN said, he had heard nothing from the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary or the other opponents of the Bill to convince him that the measure was not just and necessary. They had been told in the course of the debate that there were sufficient magistrates on the Bench in Ireland already. He did not say that they were not sufficiently numerous. It had also been said he had not shown that justice was badly administered at Petty Sessions in Ireland; but he could have mentioned many instances of unjust and extraordinary decisions had he not desired to avoid trespassing on the time of the House. He would now mention one case which had occurred in his own county. Two men were summoned on the same day before the magistrates for not having taken out licences for their dogs. One was fined 5s. and the other only 1d. Now, the man who was fined 5s. had a very large business to attend to, and forgot all about the matter; while the person who got off with a fine of 1d. was the very person who ought to have registered the dogs, being the clerk to the magistrate. The hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Verner) objected to popular election. Well, there might be a good many who entertained that objection who would not have the chance of sitting in this House again. Then the hon. Member objected to the provision he (Mr. O'Sullivan) made for the amendment by the Lord Chancellor of the election when it was an improper one. He was surprised that a substantial Conservative like the hon. Gentleman should have taken such an objection. The expenses of the election were also objected to, although they would not be more than £5, and in the poorest Unions in Ireland this would not amount to the hundredth part of a penny. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Downing) thought the Bill ought to give the power to the Guardians instead of the ratepayers. He would not object to the power being given to the Guardians, if they could vote by Ballot and if they were elected by Ballot; but he objected to giving that power to them while they were nominees of the landlords and their agents. The hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen) had spoken of the introduction of the religious element into the Bill. He had avoided that altogether, and he had never said one word about religion. He might say that there were Protestant magistrates in Ireland in whom he had more confidence than he had in many Catholic magistrates. As to the objections of the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he thought they might be considered in Committee. It was said that a Protestant magistrate would have no chance of being elected in a Catholic district. Now, as to the validity of that objection, he would appeal to many Protestants on his side who had been elected entirely by Catholics. He would also refer to the case of the county of Tipperary, an exclusively Catholic constituency, which at a former election returned a Protestant—namely, Colonel White. Need he refer to the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), and a dozen other hon. Members whom he saw around him? No. He thanked God the South of Ireland was free from bigotry, which he knew existed to a very large extent in the North. The alleged difference of opinion had been referred to as existing amongst the supporters of the Bill. There was really no difference of opinion between himself and the hon. Member for Cork, only that he did not wish the Poor Law Guardians to have the power of election unless they were elected by Ballot. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kildare (Mr. Cogan) objected to giving the people any more power. He did not wonder at that, for the last Election showed that the power of the people was very strong, and unless he was greatly mistaken, the right hon. Gentleman would find that unless he went in for Home Rule he would stand very little chance. He could not see that a single reasonable objection had been brought against the Bill. He did not want to introduce the election of magistrates all over the country, he only wanted to introduce a sprinkling of representatives of the people—namely, one magistrate from each Union, so that the people might have more confidence in the administration of justice. He said that the people were not represented on the magisterial Bench. The landlords were represented by an overwhelming majority, the Government were represented by the stipendiary magistrates, but there was not a single representative of the people.

DIVINE WORSHIP FACILITIES BILL
(Mr. Wilbraham Egerton, Mr. Birley, Mr. Whitwell, Mr. Rodwell.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that its provisions had been considerably modified in deference to the opinions which were expressed last year. It was then urged that the Bill would be a great interference with the parochial system, and that its effect would be to set up a rival clergyman in every parish. The Bill, therefore, had been modified so as to maintain intact the great principle of the parochial system, for no one was more attached than he was to that system. The Bill proposed that no clergyman should be appointed under it without a definite territorial limit being assigned within which his ministrations should be confined. The Bill did not affect the quality of the services so much as the quantity, or, in other words, the deficiency of spiritual ministrations throughout the country. The parochial system professed to provide religious ministrations for the whole community; but, at the present time, it could not be said that it covered the whole spiritual field of the country. New districts were being formed, parishes were becoming so largely populated that it became necessary to subdivide them; but, notwithstanding, there was an immense population which the parochial system did not reach, and it was to provide such population with the means of religious instruction that the Bill had been introduced. The main object of the Bill was to amend the Church Building Acts. These Acts, although of a complicated nature, had greatly increased the number of churches, but there were blots which required to be removed, and defects which remained to be supplied. The Bill would enable a patron to build a church, if he obtained the consent of the Bishop, the consent of the incumbent not being necessary. It was also proposed to give the inhabitants of a poor district that which the inhabitants of a rich district at present possessed under the Patronage Act, of providing for their own spiritual wants—

MR. MONK: I rise to Order. Is it competent to the hon. Gentleman to read every word of his speech?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to read his speech; but he can refer to his notes to refresh his memory.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON proceeded to explain the provisions of the Bill, and said, that at present, whenever an additional chapel was needed, the opposition of the incumbent could stop the whole proceeding. The Bill, therefore, proposed that the Bishop, either of his own motion or on the application of the inhabitants, should have the right of calling on the incumbent of a parish to provide sufficiently for the spiritual necessities of the district. If that were not done within three months the Bishop might appoint a Commission to inquire into the subject, and if their recommendation were favourable to the providing of further facilities for Divine worship, he would act upon it. The first duty was to see that a satisfactory stipend was provided for the clergyman, and the Bishop would then assign to him a conventional district. The patronage was to be vested in those who should provide the funds. A great deal of evidence had been taken by the Committee which had been appointed to inquire into the spiritual wants of the country, and since that Committee reported, a Committee had been also appointed by Convocation to examine the same subject. It appeared from the evidence of Canon Gregory that, notwithstanding all the work done during the last 30 years, within which no fewer than 2,000 churches had been built, the church accommodation had only kept pace with the growth of the population. In 1841 there was one incumbent to 1,095 of the population; in 1871 there was one incumbent to 1,097. In his opinion, it was decidedly necessary that these deficiencies should be supplied, if the Church of England was to deserve the name of the National Church. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners might object to this Bill on the ground that it interfered with their province; but, as a matter of fact, those Commissioners had no means of knowing the requirements of particular districts in regard to spiritual administration, and he did not think that the Bill in any way interfered with their legitimate functions. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Wilbraham Egerton.)

MR. ASSHETON, in moving the Previous Question, said, he had carefully compared this Bill with the Bill of last year, and he could not find in it one substantial alteration. In fact, what few alterations had been made did not make any serious difference between this Bill and the Bill of last year. He was astonished to hear the hon. Member say the Bill did not interfere with the parochial system, and that he himself was anxious to maintain it. Why, the principle of that system was the spiritual independence of the incumbent in his parish; and there could not be a more unquestionable interference with that system than that contained in the 2nd clause, whereby it was provided that the Bishop of a diocese, if he had reason to believe it would be expedient to provide in any parish additional facilities for the performance of Divine worship, might licence a clergyman to officiate in that parish without the sanction of the incumbent. That he regarded as utterly and entirely contrary to the parochial system. There was not time that Session to discuss properly a Bill proposing such a great innovation. Appointment by popular election might be good or bad; but it was not the method of the Church of England. The Bill did not provide that the clergyman appointed should undertake any duty. It amounted to this—that if a small knot of people got the permission of the Bishop, they might appoint a sort of privateer parson to prey on a parish, getting as much as he could from the rich, but not bound to do anything for the poor, and leaving the real work of the parish to the incumbent. The Bill did not sufficiently define habitual neglect; and if an incumbent were guilty of it, why should he not be removed, instead of a fresh clergyman being appointed? Nor were the provisions as to the stipend and other matters at all satisfactory. There were many other considerations and difficulties which suggested themselves in connection with the subject; and, upon the whole, he did not think that a Bill referring to matters of such importance ought to be taken up at so late a period of the Session. There was not sufficient time to think out all the details, and to put the measure into a workable shape. As, however, he did not altogether disapprove the objects the promoters of the Bill had in view, he did not move its rejection, but he would move the Previous Question instead.

MR. MONK seconded the Amendment. He entirely agreed with the last speaker in thinking the Bill an invasion of the rights of the incumbent. He considered the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Egerton) had not adopted the right mode for remedying the evils which existed by attempting to interfere with the parochial system. If the duties of a parish were not properly performed, it would be reasonable to give the Bishop power to call on the incumbent to appoint a curate; but in such case he should be appointed merely as an additional curate, and should have no right to interfere with the incumbent. The real object of the measure was not far to seek. What was intended by it was simply this—that whenever a certain number of parishioners held either very high Church views or very low Church views, and wished to have a particular ritual, they should be allowed to go to the Bishop and say—"Give us a clergyman who shall perform the service as we desire." He hoped that Parliament would not sanction a Bill of this description.

Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put."—(Mr. Ashton.)

MR. BIRLEY, in supporting the Bill, said, he must, at once, emphatically repudiate the explanation just given by the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) of the object aimed at by the Bill. In his (Mr. Birley's) opinion the Bishops would prefer to meet cases of neglect in the way provided by the Bill, instead of taking steps against incumbents. He desired to impress upon the House the urgent necessity of passing some measure of the kind. He, therefore, hoped the second reading would be passed, because, although it might be impossible to get the Bill through that Session, its progress next year would be facilitated. He was a Member of the Committee that sat on the Bill, when the whole circumstances were discussed. Until recently, before a church was built, an Act of Parliament was often necessary; but, by the 29th of Geo. III., facilities were given to build churches in populous districts. He submitted that the Church of England, as a national Church, ought to provide accommodation for its people in their attendance at Divine worship. It was notorious there were many instances of populous parishes the incumbents of which, for various reasons, would not assent to arrangements that were obviously necessary; and this Bill would meet such cases without necessitating the building of new churches, and by allowing licensed rooms to be used. The Bill bristled with safeguards, and would not make any appointment permanent. At all events, it would interfere far less with the parochial system, and would be less detrimental to the Church of England than the custom of allowing the ground to be occupied by Dissenting chapels, to the disadvantage of the national Church.

MR. WHALLEY supported the Previous Question, which he considered to be the proper way of treating with contempt all discussions in regard to the clergy of the Church of England until some better understanding had been arrived at as to the position which the public held in regard to that body, and until some kind of remedy had been discovered for practices of a most objectionable character which were being now carried on. At the present time, the clergy of the Church of England appeared to be a class of men who were not to be reasoned with. There were men amongst them who degraded their profession, who practised that which they had sworn not to practise, and who opposed and endeavoured to counteract all those principles which they were paid to support. Such men ought to be put down, if not dispensed with altogether. Look, for example, at that abominable book, The Priest in Absolution, which had so startled the country, and the position of the authorities of the Church in regard to it. Why, great ecclesiastical dignitaries who were not inadequately remunerated, and who were supposed to be occupied specially with the discipline of the Church, had only yesterday asserted that the volume in question had been for the first time brought to their knowledge. Those reverend gentlemen pretended to have been in ignorance up to that period of a book which had so ingrained itself into the practice of a large section of the clergy, that a man of the name of Mackonochie had said that the volume was no longer necessary, that he did not want it, that he had practised for five-and-twenty years what it contained. He considered that was a great scandal.

He apprehended that public opinion would demand that some remedy should be applied to the evil which existed in the Church through the practices inculcated in the book referred to. In the meantime, he thanked the hon. Member for Clitheroe (Mr. Assheton) for moving the Previous Question, which amounted to this—that the House would not condescend to discuss any question relating to the Church and the clergy until the matters to which he referred had been satisfactorily dealt with.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he felt certain that he represented the feeling of the House in taking up the question at the point which it had reached previously to the last speaker. It was always either too early or too late to discuss a measure they did not like; but the condition of the Order Book was probably fatal to the chance of the Bill this Session. He should, nevertheless, support the second reading, and regretted that his hon. Friend had fallen on such evil days in bringing it forward at a time when those who guided the ark of the State were not present, and when those who guided it a short time ago were absent also. The question was one that called for the most serious consideration. The Bill was excellently intended, and dealt with a deficiency which all acknowledged, yet he should be sorry to see it become law in its present state, more especially if it contained the provision which would remorselessly saddle the clergyman with a conventional district. This compulsion confounded the ideas of worship with which the measure dealt, and of pastoral charge. The Bill to some extent provided a safety-valve for tolerated differences of opinion in the Church, whether affecting doctrine or ceremonial, which was a point to which he attached much importance, as a provision for temporary places of worship would prevent parishes from being rashly cut up into permanent districts, which was too often the lavish and clumsy method of settling such disputes. He hoped that the Motion for the Previous Question would not be pressed. He put it to the majority of the Members of the House who were members of the Church of England whether they did or did not, when in town, attend their parish church as a matter of principle, because it was their parish church; and if, as he believed, the answer would be "no," then this fact illustrated the raison d'être for this Bill in other places than London. It provided that, in cases where there were differences of opinion about the parson or the services of the church, the dissentients might have a temporary chapel so long as they could pay for it, or so long as it was necessary. When it ceased to be so, they could return to the mother church, which would have sustained no permanent injury. It would be well if the aggrieved parishioners had ample opportunity of stating to the Bishop what their grievances were—whether the character of the services, or their insufficiency, or the lack of clerical strength—and that a machinery should be provided for devising, if possible, a temporary remedy short of the introduction of a fresh clergyman and the making of a new district. In particular, he would be glad if the Bill had contained a provision giving to the parson himself a period of grace wherein to find the desired services, and at his own parish church. The Bill to which this was a successor, as introduced by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt), did make such provision, and he looked upon the omission of it in the present measure as a serious defect. He had himself been a Member of the Member for Stafford's Committee, and the prevalent opinion among them, after a very wide and searching inquiry, was that the principle advocated was a sound one, though it would require liberal development, and therefore he should vote against the Previous Question.

MR. RODWELL, as a Member of the Select Committee from whom the Bill had sprung, desired to say a few words in correction of the misapprehension which existed as to its objects. The object of the parochial system was to provide for the spiritual wants of the parishioners, and it was the purpose of the Bill to further that object. One would think on hearing the opponents of the Bill that the parishes had been made for the clergy, and not the clergy for the parishes. The parochial system was a matter of theory, and were they going to sacrifice the interests of the country to a theory? Abundant evidence was given before the Select Committee that there were many cases of inadequate provision and neglect which the Bishops were powerless to meet, and in one instance it was stated a clergyman refused to attend a sick person, and yet the Bishop had no power to compel him to do so. The Bill provided a simple, cheap, temporary remedy that would not in the least interfere with any rights which an incumbent was morally justified in asserting. If he could show that increased facilities were not required, the Bishop could not interfere. On the advent of a new incumbent, the additional clergyman would retire, unless the new incumbent desired him to remain. Ritualism had nothing whatever to do with the history of the Bill, which was originally introduced by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt), now Secretary to the Local Government Board. It would be possible to insert in the Bill any necessary safeguards; and, although it might be impossible to pass the Bill this year, it would be well to read it a second time by way of facilitating future legislation.

MR. GREENE, who had hitherto opposed Bills of this character, would vote for the second reading of this Bill, because it embodied safeguards against abuse. It ought to be watched jealously in Committee to see that the parochial system was not weakened. Though it could not be carried now, it would be well to affirm its principle. As to the practices alluded to he did not believe the Bill would give them any facilities, and believing they were generally repudiated by the common sense of the people, he should support the Bill.

MR. CARPENTER-GARNIER could not support the Bill. The expense of enrolling legal districts might be great, but the proper remedy was to amend the law in that respect, and not to map out conventional districts. The introduction of a clergyman against the will of the incumbent, who had to pay him, must occasion strife and divisions, for collisions would be inevitable in the management of schools, and of charities, and in visiting, and these collisions would probably result in the two preaching against each other.

MR. MILBANK supported the Bill in the interest of the Church of England. In his own district in Yorkshire they had very extensive church parishes so large and so inadequately supplied with the necessary means of church accommodation that, as a consequence, Dissenting chapels were springing up rapidly in all directions. Although the clergymen of those parishes had endeavoured, under great difficulties, to perform their duty, it could not be expected they could induce the parishioners to walk a distance of eight or nine miles in order to reach a chapel-of-ease. All this would be knocked in the head if churches and clergymen were provided.

Mr. WALTER, as a Member of the Select Committee, would support the Bill. He did not look to it so much for any great advantages in the increase of accommodation, for he thought the existing Acts of Parliament went far to meet any difficulty which existed in that direction; but he did look to it to provide remedies in those cases where there was a clergyman who could not be dislodged or disturbed, who did not bring himself under the law, who did not break the Commandments so as to enable the Ecclesiastical Law to meet him, and who was, nevertheless, a man for whom the parishioners could not feel any respect. It being difficult to dislodge the clergyman, there ought to be some remedy for the parishioners who wished to go to church to get good. There were few Members of the House who could not put their hands on a parish where such a grievance existed. Although he would not pledge himself to particular details of the Bill, he held that this was a grievance that required a remedy. There were cases in which it had existed many years, in which the clergyman had, so to speak, sat upon the people for 20, 30, or 40 years, and the people had no redress. The result was that Dissent had flourished, and meeting-houses multiplied. He wanted to be relieved of that difficulty; and as he believed the Bill would provide a remedy, he would support the principle without committing himself to the details.

Mr. HENLEY joined in supporting the Bill, remarking that something of its character was the only way in which they could meet the constant necessities of the case. Anyone who was old enough—as he was—to remember the million of money which was granted after the war must see that in these matters the remedy had always come behind, and had not succeeded in reaching the mischief it was intended to guard against—namely, that owing to the great increase in the population the church accommodation was found not to be sufficient. The Bill now under consideration was intended to remedy the defect, and it was upon those grounds that he considered it his duty to support the second reading.

AGRICULTURAL TENEMENTS SECURITY FOR IMPROVEMENTS BILL.

(Mr. J. W. Barclay, Sir George Balfour, Mr. Earp.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. J. W. BARCLAY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained that its objects were to encourage and stimulate improved cultivation of the land, to give security to the tenant for the value of improvements which benefited his successor, and to secure to the landlord his fair right to the increased value of the soil. What with untoward seasons, higher wages, cattle diseases, and foreign competition, farming had been very unremunerative in recent years; and many hon. Members had doubtless experience of difficulty in letting farms, and larger arrears of rent than usual. Farmers did not complain of low prices or foreign competition; but they did complain that they had not a fair amount of control over their farms, and had not the same opportunities which manufacturers possessed of making the most of their business. The law by declaring that the money which a tenant might expend in improving his farm belonged to the landlord when it was incorporated in the soil, or even, as in the cases of houses, when placed upon the landlord's soil, and perhaps even more, the antiquated and often absurd conditions regarding cultivation and crops imposed by the landlord on the tenant prejudicially affected, not only the interests of the tenants and of the public at large, but that of the landlord himself. It was to endeavour to find a remedy for some of these evils he had introduced this Bill. It was true that the present Parliament had passed an Agricultural Holdings Act to remedy this state of things; but that Act was practically a dead letter. Landlords generally did not give their tenants security for the money they invested in improving the soil. Certainly the ordinary 19 years' lease which prevailed in Scotland was not sufficient to enable the tenant to recoup himself from his crops for the capital which it was now found necessary to invest in the soil. No doubt, the lease had done much to encourage the improvement of land in Scotland; but although a 19 years' lease might have at one time been sufficient, it was not now adequate to permit a farmer to recoup himself for the much larger amount of capital found necessary to meet the requirements of modern agriculture. The principles which he had endeavoured to embody in the present Bill were simple. Improvements were to be divided into two classes, called respectively permanent and temporary improvements. Under the name of permanent improvements the Bill included those improvements of land which should properly be executed by the landlord; but inasmuch as many landlords would not put themselves to the trouble, or encounter the risk of executing these improvements, the Bill provided that if a tenant carried out these improvements at his own expense, he should be entitled to a reasonable compensation for them at the end of his lease. The tenant, however, when he resolved on the improvement would first have to give notice to his landlord of what he intended to do; and if the landlord agreed to interest himself so far in the matter, he could ask the tenant to give him an estimate of the cost of the improvement, and if he offered to advance three-fourths of that cost himself, the remaining fourth would be expended by the tenant, who would also have to pay the landlord during the remainder of his lease 5 per cent per annum interest upon what the landlord expended. That was an arrangement which would be advantageous to the landlord, because he would have an improvement made upon his estate on advancing three-fourths of its cost, and during the remainder of the tenant's occupation he would receive 5 per cent interest on his outlay. Power would be reserved to the landlord to object to any improvement which the tenant desired to make on the ground, either that it was not suitable to the holding, or that it would prejudice the estate generally; and those seemed to him (Mr. Barclay) to be the only two grounds on which any reasonable landlord would object to improvement of his land. On either of these two grounds the landlord could object, and if he showed that his objection was well founded, he could prevent the tenant from carrying out improvements; or, at all events, would cease to be responsible for them himself. The other class—that of temporary improvements—set forth in the Schedule of the Bill, included only those which ought naturally to fall on the cultivator of land, and which the landlord ought not to be called upon to execute. They were improvements the successful carrying out of which very much depended on the individual, both with regard to the cost and to the quality of the work, and which ought to recoup themselves in a few years. If the tenant carried them out and had to leave the farm before he had had time to recoup himself for the outlay, he was to have compensation, but the compensation would come practically, not from the landlord, but from his successor in the farm. The first class of improvements—those of a permanent character—were those which the landlord should pay for, and for which he would recoup himself by an increased rent from succeeding tenants; and the second class—or temporary improvements—were those which the cultivator of the soil ought to execute, and for which, if he was not repaid during the continuance of his tenancy, he would be recouped under this Bill by the in-coming tenant. The in-coming tenant again would be indemnified by receiving the farm in much better condition than it otherwise would have been. These were the two main principles of the Bill. There was also a provision for compensation of the tenant for unexhausted manures or fertilizers; but, as that was merely an extension of the present system of compensation, he would not dwell upon it. The Bill would have the effect of enabling parties, who as matters stood at present could not have the opportunity of contracting together, to adjust claims upon equitable terms—he referred to the outgoing and in-coming tenants. This, he considered, would be very advantageous for both parties. The Bill sought to lay down the general equitable principles whereby the in-coming tenant should pay to the out-going tenant a fair and reasonable compensation for the money which the latter had left to benefit the former in the soil. In settling what should be the amount of compensation, he had endeavoured to embody in the Bill provisions, not to enact a custom, because that was impracticable, but to lay down general principles the application of which was not tied down by any hard-and-fast rules, but in regard to which there was a considerable amount of elasticity, so that those principles might be fairly and equitably adapted to the various districts of the country. In dealing with such a question as improvement upon land, hard-and-fast rules as to the amount of compensation could not be laid down, because what would be a fair amount of compensation in one district would probably be unfair in another. He had laid down in the Bill what were the matters in respect of which an out-going tenant was to be compensated, and he hoped that under the provisions of arbitration a custom would by-and-by grow up in various districts throughout the country, under which it would be well known and clearly established what was a fair and proper compensation to allow to the out-going tenant under the peculiar circumstances of each case. The compensation both with regard to permanent and temporary improvements was to be fixed by arbitrators, who, after taking into consideration what was the increased value of the farm due to the improvements, what had been the cost of the improvements, and what benefit the out-going tenant had derived from them, would fix such a sum as they thought fair and equitable under the circumstances; but the compensation was limited by an over-ruling clause, which specified that no compensation for permanent improvements should exceed 15 years' purchase of the increased value of the holding due to the improvements, and in the case of temporary improvements, that the compensation should in no case exceed five years' purchase of the increased value of the land due to the improvements. Then it was provided, on the other hand, that the landlord should have power to obtain compensation for depreciation, or else to eject the tenant. Arbitrators were to have power to examine a farm in the interest of the landlord, and if they found the farm in bad order, the tenant was bound to conform to the instructions of the arbitrators, and if he failed to carry out an improved cultivation, the landlord should have power to eject him. It might seem hard to the tenant that the landlord should have that power, and representation of this point had been made to him by many farmers; but it seemed to him equitable and just that, while on the one hand the tenant had a right to claim from the landlord compensation for improvements, the landlord, on the other, should have a right to claim compensation for depreciation, and to ultimately eject a tenant who persisted, after the arbitrators had given their award, in exhausting or improperly cultivating the farm. The hon. Member was proceeding, when—

AFFLICTED CLASSES (IRELAND) BILL

(NO. 110.) SECOND READING.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD O'HAGAN, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said :

My Lords, the Bill which I have laid on the Table will, if it be approved by Parliament, have very important results for multitudes of our fellow-suffering countrymen, and your Lordships will bear with me while I state very briefly the motives which have led me to introduce it. So long ago as 1851 the Irish Census Commissioners addressed the Irish Government in these terms—

"We respectfully suggest to your Excellency the propriety of taking some steps towards the education and moral improvement of idiots and imbeciles—a subject which at present engages the attention of the philanthropic both in England and on the Continent, where several establishments for the purpose have been erected, and are supported by the State, and in which the susceptibility of this class to a certain amount of education has been demonstrated."

Ten years passed, and the suggestion had produced no result—nothing whatever was done to educate or improve these miserable people. A new Census took place, and in 1861 the Commissioners again pressed upon the Executive the same continuing necessity in precisely the same words;—but unhappily with no better effect—to the present hour no Government has paid any attention to it, and in 1877 things remain exactly as they were in 1851. A generation has passed away—the great work of charity which was urged by the Commissioners has gone on successfully abroad; and many of your Lordships may have seen the admirable institutions which have long existed in Belgium and elsewhere, redeeming unhappy children from darkness and misery, and restoring them in numbers to comparative intelligence and capacity for the business of life. In England very much has been done, and is doing, for the same noble purpose. Many admirable institutions have been established for the benefit of these unfortunate persons, and a great and good work has been accomplished. Ireland has had almost no share in this happy progress—for the first Irish Poor Law had no reference to the care of imbeciles. The Act of 1843, which provided for the deaf and dumb and blind, did not apply to those whose case is certainly not less lamentable, who have less power of self-help or self-assertion, who have far less chance of developing such capabilities of culture or enjoyment as God may have left to them, and whose miseries, from the neglect, disgust, or ill-treatment of those around them, are incomparably greater. This began to be felt in England, and the Act of 1862 enabled the Guardians of the Poor to send to certified schools not only the blind and deaf, but also "lame, deformed, or idiotic persons." That Act does not extend to Ireland, and its beneficent provisions are to this hour denied her. What powers were given by the Act of 1843 have been admirably utilised. Voluntary institutions, amply endowed by voluntary benevolence, have been aided by the State, and Europe does not contain any establishments more efficiently worked for the blind and the deaf and dumb. On the same principles our reformatories and industrial schools have been made fruitful of immense advantage; and there is no sort of reason why, by the same agencies, asylums for imbeciles should not have been created with the same great results. But those agencies have not been provided; and whilst in this regard the rest of the world has been moving on, Ireland has remained where she was a quarter of a century ago. Fortunately, the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums in Ireland distinguish imbeciles from lunatics in their statistical returns—a practice which the Commissioners and lunatic asylums in England would do well to follow, and I am, therefore, enabled to state to your Lordships the actual number and respective positions at the end of 1874. On the 31st December in that year there were in Ireland 8,151 imbeciles and idiots, of whom 1,740 were in workhouses, 638 were in asylums, and 5,773 were at large and utterly uncared for. The beneficence of a good physician, Dr. Stewart, who has devoted the earnings of his life to the maintenance of an institution for idiots, provides more or less for 43, many of whom are supported in it by their relatives; but there remain nearly 6,000, some 71 per cent of the whole, whose education and moral improvement are as entirely disregarded as when the Commissioners made their appeal in 1851. Crowds of them are homeless wanderers, exposed to all extremities of want and suffering, miserable in themselves, and a nuisance to that society which too often treats them with contumely and insult. Is not this a reproach to our humanity and a scandal to our civilization? Only 10 per cent of lunatics are so neglected in Ireland—

perhaps, unhappily, because they are feared by their fellow-men, whilst the poor imbeciles may safely be despised and left to pine and perish, and the minority, who are received into the asylum and the workhouse, ought not to be there. The imbecile and the lunatic should never be associated.

"It has long been our opinion," say the English Commissioners in Lunacy in 1865, "as the result of extended experience and observation, that the association of idiot children with lunatics is very objectionable and injurious to them, and upon our visits to country asylums we have frequently suggested arrangements for their separate treatment and instruction. It is always to us a painful thing to see idiot children, whose mental faculties and physical powers and habits are capable of much development and improvement, wandering without object or special care about the wards of a lunatic asylum. The benefits to be derived even in idiot cases apparently hopeless from a distinctive system, and from persevering endeavours to develop the dormant powers, physical and intellectual, are now so fully established that any argument upon the subject would be superfluous."

And the workhouse is for the imbecile, I need not say, a still worse abode than the asylum. It affords him no chance of training or development. It makes him the subject of ill-treatment and annoyance from those on whom his presence exerts a painful and demoralizing influence. In this state of things I offer to your Lordships a Bill which for the first time aims to carry out the suggestions of 1851 and 1861. It will secure for Ireland the advantage of English legislation, which has been so long enjoyed by the people of this country, and supply the machinery and the means for improving the condition of the thousands whose pitiable condition appeals to all our generous sympathies. I shall not argue that it is the right of those wretched people to be dealt with, as human beings, considerately and kindly, or that it is the duty of the Legislature to see that they are so dealt with. Until a recent period all who were afflicted with mental alienation or mental weakness suffered grievously from popular prejudice and ignorance—sometimes from gross neglect, sometimes from grosser cruelty; but better times have come, and humaner counsels have prevailed. We know that the lunatic's best possibility of cure is not from the dark cell or the iron chain, and that the imbecile is often capable of intellectual application, and of some, though limited enjoyment. There is no longer a difference of opinion on these points—a large experience has made them plain and indisputable—the imbecile may be made industrious and happy. In the Grafton Street Institution and others to which I have referred, there are children who in other circumstances would have been thought incapable of thinking with regard to this life or the next, but who, by means of the care bestowed upon them in these institutions, have developed considerable intelligence, taken an interest in the industry in which they are employed, and are capable even of religious instruction. No one who has seen the children in the Royal Albert Asylum can have the smallest doubt that they are capable of becoming industrious and intelligent, and, above all, are capable of an enjoyment such as, but for an exercise of the charity I ask your Lordships to exercise, they never could have had in this world. But on these grounds only I do not base my appeal for those changes which will equalize English and Irish law and take away a great shame from Ireland. I shall say, in words which are not more felicitous and expressive than true in thought and generous in feeling—

“It is much, in an industrial point of view, to be able to turn idlers into workers, more especially when those idlers are not only themselves incapable of labour, but, by the necessity of being looked after, the keeping other persons from what might be useful and productive employment. But it is still more important, as I think, to assert, as we do by our care of these unfortunate persons, the principle that a human being is to be respected and valued as such, not for his capacity of productive labour, not merely for the sharpness of his wits, not because there is anything about him which is pleasant to see or which it is agreeable to have to do with; but simply because he is a member of the human race, born on English soil, and, therefore, in that double capacity has a claim upon us as a human being and an Englishman.”

My Lords, these are the weighty words of the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He has done immense service to the cause of these imbeciles of England. On behalf of those of Ireland I press the same urgent claim, on the same high grounds which he has taken, and I am sure your Lordships will not regret it. You have already accepted unanimously an elaborate measure for the regulation of the practice in lunacy of the Irish Court of Chancery, which I had the good fortune to carry through this House some years ago. It has worked admirably, and will be still more useful in the future for the protection of lunatics having property, great or small, over whom the Lord Chancellor has proper jurisdiction. The more numerous lunatics of a lower class are well taxed for in our direct asylums, which are liberally endowed and wisely managed, and if the Legislature will aid by its sanction and support the object of this Bill much good will be accomplished, and a great work of charity and mercy made complete.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2.”
—(The Lord O’Hagan.)

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he would not have offered any opposition to the Bill, if he could see that it would be carried out in a proper and legitimate manner, as was done in England; but so far as he could understand the provisions of the Bill, its operation would differ from that of the Act for England. It did not seem to him that imbeciles would be cared for under the provisions of this Bill as they were here. He could not find any provision in the Bill for that close inspection and those minute returns which were required under the Act for England. He thought no paupers or other persons should be sent to any institution without strict inquiry. The Committee or Commission to which the noble and learned Lord referred recommended, as he understood, that these institutions should be made public institutions. Last year an Act was passed for the removal of harmless lunatics first of all to a poor-house, and he should have thought that Act applied to imbeciles, and that they could be sent to a properly certified house. The English Act gave a right of entrance to institutions of this sort to every guardian, overseer, and medical officer; but, so far as he could see, that was not provided for in this Bill. He thought this Bill would be a step towards doing away with public institutions, and after a little while sending the poor as well as the imbecile into private institutions which would not be at all under public supervision, as he thought they ought to be. He did not think the Bill could be amended in Committee without being completely taken to pieces, and, therefore, he moved that the Bill be read a second time this day three months.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months.")—
The Lord Oranmore and Browne.)

LORD INCHQUIN said, he would support the Bill, and thought the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord O'Hagan) was entitled to all praise for having brought this subject under their Lordships' attention. In a recent Report of the Charity Organization Society it was especially recommended that this class of imbeciles and idiots should not be placed in the same house nor be subject to the same control with the more dangerous class of lunatics; and it was evident that by mixing the different classes much injury might be done to the former. Much of the lunacy of Ireland was due to the adulteration of drink. He hoped that Her Majesty's Government, even if they could not see their way to supporting the Bill, would deem the subject worthy of investigation.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY hoped their Lordships would not give their assent to the second reading of this Bill. He shared in the sympathy of his noble and learned Friend for the afflicted; but he thought that the 5,700 imbeciles now at large in Ireland were much happier in the pure air of Heaven than they would be if shut up, and that the noble and learned Lord had not made out his case; for he said that in Ireland a distinction was drawn between lunatics and imbeciles, and that they were not placed in contact, which was bad for them, whilst in England they were placed together; and so long as so many lunatics were at large in this country who were dangerous to the interests of England, the 5,700 imbeciles in Ireland, who were quite harmless, might be left at large. Though the imbeciles in Ireland were at large, they were not necessarily neglected, and this Bill would strike a blow at one of the best traits in the Irish character, for the poor in Ireland were remarkable for their kindness and good treatment of imbeciles. Moreover, their Lordships would remember that the Party which passed the Disestablishment of the Irish Church intended to apply the surplus of the Church funds to lunatic asylums; and it appeared to him that there might be a desire now to swell the number of lunatics and afflicted in order to justify such an application of the surplus. But however that might be, he thought that if the country should decide upon such an application of the surplus, it would be better to wait till then, instead of raising more money for this purpose by taxation.

THE EARL OF COURTOWN said, that though it might be as well that some such measure as this should be adopted by Parliament, it seemed to him that the Bill before their Lordships was open to several objections. He objected on the ground of the additional burdens it would cast upon the ratepayers, and doubted whether it was within the competence of their Lordships to entertain the taxation clauses. He objected also to the arbitrary power of arrest given to the police in respect of lunatics found.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, there could be no doubt that the subject which had been brought before the House by the noble and learned Lord was one of great importance; but there were two reasons why he thought it would be inexpedient to press the Bill at the present time. In the first place, the Government, fully alive to the magnitude and interest of the question, proposed to issue a Commission to inquire thoroughly into the whole matter; and, in the second place, even if that were not the case, he did not think it would be advisable to embark upon a measure of this kind at so advanced a period of the Session, more especially when it was remembered that there was a Committee of the other House sitting at the present moment upon the whole of the Lunacy Laws of the country.

LORD O'HAGAN said, that after the assurance of the noble Duke he should not ask their Lordships to proceed further with his Bill.

Then the said Amendment, original Motion, and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

NEW FOREST BILL—(No. 123.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, he would remind their Lordships that the subject-matter of the measure had already passed through the ordeal of various inquiries and investigations in Committees of both Houses of Parliament. The principal object of the Bill was to define the mode in which the Office of Woods and Forests should exercise the powers given to it by existing Acts—namely, the Acts passed in 1691, in 1808, and in 1851—in reference mainly to the rights of the commoners, the public, and the Crown, and to amend the constitution of the Governing Body of the Forest. The area of the New Forest was at the present time something like 63,000 acres. Formerly—in the days of William the Conqueror and the Norman Kings—it had been larger; but it had since been diminished to the area he had just named. The ownership of the Forest—or, rather, those who were interested in it—might be divided into three heads. In the first place, there was the Office of Woods and Forests, representing the interests of the Crown; in the second place, there were the commoners, numbering about 1,300, and composed partly of small freeholders and labourers, whose rights had existed for hundreds of years; and then there was the public, who were interested in the preservation of the Forest as an open space for the purposes of recreation. As to the rights of the two first—the Crown and the commoners—by the 12th and 13th clauses of the Bill, the existing rights of the Crown were preserved, and if the measure passed those rights would in no way be interfered with. The clauses ran as follows:—

“12. Nothing in this Act shall take away, abridge, or prejudicially affect any estate, right, title, power, claim, or privilege of Her Majesty, in, over, or to the Forest except in so far as is by this Act provided in relation to the exercise of the right of enclosure and the exercise of the right of enforcing the fence month and winter heyning during the payment of such acknowledgment as is in this Act on that behalf mentioned; and in the event of the Forest being disafforested and separate allotments being made to Her Majesty, and to the persons entitled to rights of common in or over the Forest, every estate, right, title, power, claim, and privilege of Her Majesty, in, over, or to the Forest, and the rights of the persons so entitled as aforesaid, shall respectively be estimated, valued, and allowed as they would have been if this Act had not been passed, and it is hereby declared that the right of Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, to common of pasture and other rights of common over the Forest in respect of any property belonging to Her Majesty in severalty be unimpaired. 13. Nothing in this Act shall affect or prejudice any right of the Crown to any dues or sums hitherto payable by the commoners or other persons.”

He might add that the rights of the Crown and of the commoners had been generally estimated as being about equal. That fact was shown by an arrangement which was made when a railway was constructed through that part of the country, the money paid by the Railway Company being laid out for the mutual benefit of the Crown and the commoners. The entire subject had been considered by several Committees. One Committee of their Lordships' House sat in 1868 to inquire into the operation of the Deer Removal Act, and in their Report they recommended equitable consideration being given to the claims of the commoners. That recommendation, however, did not find general favour, either in or out of Parliament. The country was not in favour of having the main features of a Forest, which had practically remained unchanged for something like 800 years, altered in the manner suggested by the Committee. A Bill to give effect to the recommendation was introduced in 1870; but having been read a first time, it was not afterwards heard of. For several centuries there had been no dispute as to the relative rights existing in the Forest. The Crown enjoyed the right of sporting, the commoners enjoyed the rights of which he had spoken; and only at a comparatively recent period did any difference of opinion arise. He would remind their Lordships that in 1698 an Act called the Plantation Act passed, which recited that it was necessary that an opportunity should be given of growing timber to keep up the Navy of the country, and the provisions of the Act were drawn with that view. In the year 1808 another Act was passed which superseded the former Act to a certain extent. It carefully set out that the planting under the Act should be done judiciously, and Commissioners were appointed to arbitrate between the Crown and the commoners, so that the interest of the latter might not be injuriously affected. The first real difficulty occurred after the passing of the Act of 1851, which was known as the Deer Removal Act. By that Act power was given for the first time to plant trees as distinguished from timber. The Office of Woods claimed such power of planting under that Act—and of planting fir trees totally irrespective of the rights of the commoners—that at no distant period the whole of the New Forest would have become one vast fir wood. He would leave it to their Lordships to say whether the rights of the commoners or the enjoyment of the public would in any way have been preserved if that course had been adopted. The commoners came to the conclusion that the views of the Office of Woods as regarded planting were not wholly confined to the object of improving the New Forest. They thought, in fact, from the proceedings of the Department, that the Office of Woods was actuated by some desire to depreciate the rights of the commoners in case of disafforestation;—and he admitted that from the evidence taken before the Committee of the House of Commons in 1854 the commoners did not appear to have been so very far wrong. Mr. Cumberbatch, the Deputy Surveyor of the Forest, in a letter addressed to the Chief Commissioner, dated the 31st of December, 1853, spoke of the power acquired under the Crown by the Deer Removal Act as follows:—

“If this were done”—that is, large areas at once taken for planting—“nearly the whole of the land fit to grow oak timber in the New Forest that is not covered with growing plantations or already enclosed for the purpose of planting would be enclosed,” and “much would become self-sown; exclusive of other advantages, by so doing all the best pasture would be taken from the commoners, and the value of their rights of pasture would thus be materially diminished, which would be of importance to the Crown in the event of any such rights being commuted.”

In 1854, Mr. Cumberbatch was examined before the Select Committee of the House of Commons, and, in reply to Mr. E. Denison, said—

“There are several requirements in the New Forest; one is, that land should be cleared for planting; and another is that as much land as possible should be kept covered with timber—because whenever we come to a general enclosure the more land is covered with timber, the greater allotment the Crown will get, and therefore I think the policy of the Crown is to keep as much land as possible covered with timber.”

In 1875, Mr. Howard, the Chief Commissioner of Woods, when under examination before the Select Committee of the House of Commons, was asked, with respect to the letter of Mr. Cumberbatch, whether he thought it a fair policy to adopt towards the commoners, to which he replied that—

“He thought it was good advice for the deputy surveyor to give to his employers; but he had better have done it ried voce.”

The Chief Commissioner would, therefore, not have made known the views so expressed by the deputy surveyor. Mr. Howard was afterwards asked whether he was disposed to repudiate that policy; to which he answered—“No, I do not repudiate it; I only say it had better not have been printed.” Now, he (the Duke of Richmond) might almost rest his case upon that statement; but further on, in answer to another Member of the Committee, Mr. Howard, said that the policy of Mr. Cumberbatch, in a worldly point of view, was right, and ought to be adopted. But what was to become, in that case, of the unfortunate commoners he (the Duke of Richmond) did not know. The Office of Woods claim to have planted 16,000 acres of the New Forest with trees, which made that space valueless to the commoners. In 1870 representations were made to the Commissioners appointed under the Act of 1851, who were asked to mediate between the Office of Woods and the commoners. The latter complained that their interests had been unjustly dealt with. The Commissioners agreed in that view, and accordingly they declined to sanction the arrangements proposed. They had a meeting on the 14th of September, 1870, at which they came to this determination, and they had never met since; so that the operation of the Act of 1851 had come to a deadlock. In 1871 a Resolution was agreed to by the House of Commons that, pending legislation, no further enclosures should be allowed. A Select Committee was appointed by the other House in 1875. It was one in which both Houses would feel confidence, and it sat 14 days. The Committee examined Mr. Howard, the Chief Commissioner of Woods; Mr. Watson, solicitor; Mr. Cumberbatch, the deputy surveyor; Mr. Olutton, the Crown Surveyor of Timber, &c. They inquired very fully into the interests of the commoners and the public, and they agreed to a Report. The Committee had two courses open to them—the alternative of disafforesting, which had commended itself to the Committee of their Lordships' House in 1868, and the less violent remedy of endeavouring to reconcile conflicting interests by doing what was just and fair to all parties. The last was the recommendation they adopted in their Report, and the Bill was absolutely and entirely identical with the Report, as far as a Bill could follow the Report of a Committee. The Committee of the House of Commons recommended—

“That powers of enclosure conferred by statute shall be exercised only on that area which has hitherto been taken in at various times, and been either kept or thrown out under the Acts 9 & 10 Will. III., c. 36, 48 Geo. III., c. 72, and the Deer Removal Act, 1851. That the Crown should retain the power of keeping 16,000 acres of growing timber and trees planted under the Acts of William III. and 1851 at all times under enclosure; and that the Crown be entitled to enclose and throw out at will any portion of the area over which the powers of planting are to be exercised, with a view to its unrestricted use in such manner as may be deemed expedient for the most profitable growth of timber and trees; but that the rolling power over the open portion of the forest not now planted or enclosed under the Acts William III. or 1851 should cease. That a nominal quit-rent be charged by the Crown to the commoners for the exercise of the right of common during fence month and winter heyning; provision may be made, if possible, for the payment of such quit-rent by some body representative of the commoners. That the Verderers Court be re-constituted, so as to better represent the commoners, and to have power to regulate the exercise of the commoners' rights over the Forest, and to appoint officers to prevent encroachments upon them. That all the rights of the Crown reserved under the Acts of William III. and 1851, except as it is herein suggested that they should be modified, be maintained.”

Those were the provisions which the Government had introduced into the present Bill. There were some other points with regard to the “winter heyning” and the fence month, into which it was unnecessary to enter. The Bill also provided a new constitution for the Court of Verderers. The present measure was introduced into the other House of Parliament, where it was referred to a Select Committee. The Committee only sat for one day, and only a single division occurred on one of the provisions of the Bill, the numbers being eight to one in favour of the Bill. The Amendment of which the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) had given Notice went to destroy the Bill altogether. What the noble Duke meant was disafforestation, which he advocated some years ago. If the Bill did not pass, matters would revert to the status quo which had existed ever since the Resolution of the House of Commons in 1871 that, pending legislation, nothing should be done. If, however, nothing was to be done, it seemed to him that the position of affairs in the New Forest would be very bad. He trusted that their Lordships would pass a Bill which carried into effect the recommendations of the House of Commons Committee, and under which the rights of the commoners would be protected, while the rights of the Crown would be in no way interfered with. He now asked their Lordships to give this Bill a second reading.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2.”
—(The Lord President.)

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, in moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time this day three months, said, that he rose to oppose this Bill as injurious to the rights of the Crown:—it was a Bill, in fact, to take away the property of the Crown, and transfer it to the commoners and the electors of Southampton. He would first ask their Lordships to remember what were the rights of the Crown with regard to the New Forest. The Crown had practically a right to 63,000 acres of land in the New Forest; it had forestal rights; and it had also 2,000 acres which were the absolute property of the Crown, and were held altogether separately. The right with which they were now dealing was the right of the Crown to these 63,000 acres. He would ask their Lordships to consider what were the rights of the Crown separately from the Act of 1851—because, by the present Bill, they were about to repeal altogether the Act of 1851. Previous to that Act the Crown had an absolute right to the soil—it had a right to keep an unlimited stock of deer—the number shortly before the Act was passed had been about 8,000—and, in fact, the Crown had a right to stock the Forest with deer to any extent, and the rights of the commoners were quite subordinate to that right. The Crown had also an exclusive right to the Forest during six months of the year—the six months of “winter heyning” and the fence month. During the summer therefore, the rights of the commoners were in abeyance, and their cattle, pigs, and whatever stock they had were sent away. The Crown had also the "rolling right," that is, the right of planting 6,000 acres; and when any part of that area was covered with trees high enough to be secure from injury by deer or by commoners' cattle, the Crown had a right to inclose as many acres as it then threw open. On the other hand, the commoners had the right of pasture, concurrent with the Crown's rights, during six months of the year; they had also a right to a certain amount of timber for fuel, but not for sale, and the right to cut turf under consent of the verderers; but all those rights were subordinate to the rights of the Crown. About 1840 the House of Commons entertained a notion that the property of the Crown might be made much more valuable, and they accordingly appointed a Committee to inquire into the different forests of the Crown. The Committee considered the New Forest in 1848 and 1849, and made certain recommendations. In the year 1850 a Royal Commission was appointed to consider the state of the New Forest and the means of improving it. It inquired under the presidency of Lord Portman; and it reported that the first thing to do was to get rid of the deer, as it was impossible to improve the Forest so long as they were retained; and, moreover, that deer were the cause of demoralization of the surrounding population, owing to the poaching to which it gave rise. In 1850, when the Commission reported, Her Majesty had done him the honour of appointing him to the Office of Woods, which was at that time a Parliamentary Office, and he had to consider how the recommendation of the Commission regarding the deer could be carried into effect. He looked to see what had been done in previous times. He found that in 1786 there had been a very careful inquiry, followed by legislation. Following the precedent of a Bill introduced by the Government in the year 1792, he proposed to abolish the right of the Crown to maintain deer, and to inclose 20,000 acres as a set-off. This was in accordance with measures formerly adopted in other Royal forests. A Bill to that effect passed the second reading, and was referred to a Select Committee, by which it was approved. But some persons representing the commoners and landowners of the New Forest came to him and said he had taken too much land in consideration of abolishing the deer. Meetings were held; and after some time it was agreed, instead of taking 20,000 acres, to limit himself to 10,000 acres, which, with 6,000 previously taken under the Act of 1698, extended the rights of the Crown to 16,000 acres, and a Bill to that effect was passed in 1851. At that time the rights of the commoners had not been clearly ascertained. A Commission was appointed to ascertain those rights, and a considerable sum of money was spent. A small portion of the Forest was under the Bill agreed to be sold to defray that expense. When that was done it was not thought that in establishing 1,000 or 1,200 men in perfect rights of common they were giving them a great interest in resisting the rights of the Crown. Before that the commoners had not the same interest; but when they saw that they had real rights entered in a book they could combine together, and they combined accordingly, saying that their rights were much injured. Some of them were electors for South Hampshire, and as soon as they got that right they used it for the purpose of increasing their rights. The Act of 1851 reserved the rights of the Crown, providing that nothing contained in it should tend to take away, alter, or affect any of the rights or privileges whatsoever of Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, in, over, and upon the Forest other than the right of keeping deer there. The Act left all the other rights of the Crown, save that of keeping deer, untouched in any way. Therefore, the rights of winter heyning and the exclusive right over the Forest for six months remained vested in the Crown. That was the decision of the Commission which sat and considered the subject. In 1868 they had a Committee of that House. It was quite true that it proposed to disafforest the Forest to a certain extent. If another arrangement were to be made, he saw no other way than to give some of the property to the Crown in severalty, and so separate the rights of the Crown altogether from those of the commoners. It was quite clear that a joint occupation of common was injudicious, and must be the subject of continual disputes. The Committee of 1868 said, and said truly, that the interests of the Crown and those of moners were at variance, and that must be a perpetual struggle between those conflicting interests. The Committee were of opinion that the right was to appoint a Commission for some portion of the Forest to the in fee, free from all common

That was proposed by the Commission 1868. It was, he confessed, with the view that he agreed to that Report, did so because he saw no other way of settling the dispute between the Crown and the commoners. Well, as proposed to be done by this Bill? It repealed the Act of 1851; it provided that the Crown was to have a right over no more than about 16,000 or 17,000 acres, while the commoners were to have the other 45,000 acres. That was a very unfair division. The forests of the Crown were taken away; the exclusive rights for six months were taken away; and the Crown was placed in a much worse position than it occupied before the Act of 1851, but it had the right of keeping deer. The 14th clause of the present Bill provided that in consideration of the grant to Her Majesty on behalf of the commoners of the sum of 20s. on or before the 14th of January the rights of Her Majesty to the winter heyning and the month were all to cease. When asked at that he naturally said to—"Here the Crown's right for six months is valued at £1 sterling." What was the right of the commoners valued at? The commoners' right was not an exclusive right, but concurrent with the right of the Crown.

He thought a most unjust arrangement as to the constitution of the Verderers—the verderers were seven in number, six to be elective, the Crown was to appoint only one. The verderers were not to take an oath of office; and that was well, because they were to do what was expected of them, there was to be no justice for the

The electors were to be, not the commoners only, but all persons whose names were on the list of Parliamentary electors of any parish within the perambulation of the Forest. With regard to the Committee of 1877, it was true that it had been referred to a Select Committee—the Committee sat exactly one

New Forest were computed to be from one-half to two-thirds of the value of the Forest; while Mr. Clutton, an eminent land surveyor, acquainted with the district, estimated them at less than one-half. I now come to what the noble Duke calls the bargain of 1851. The noble Duke speaks of that arrangement as though it had been a bargain between the commoners on the one hand and the Crown on the other. The persons to whom the noble Duke refers were those who lived upon the confines of the Forest, and who were interested and rejoiced very much in its amenities, which were of great advantage to them. It was quite true that their case was that the deer were a great inconvenience to them—that they had been compelled to fence in their property against the deer, which they alleged did considerable injury to it; and their demand was that the Crown should give up keeping those animals in the Forest. But the poor commoners did not intervene—in fact, at that time, and, indeed, for some years afterwards,

it was not known who the commoners were; but it was subsequently ascertained that they consisted mainly of poor men having small properties to whom the pasturage in the Forest was of considerable value. And what was the view of the deer taken by these persons?
Why, instead of being a disadvantage to them, they were of the greatest possible advantage, inasmuch as they kept down the rank herbage, the heather, and the low undergrowth, which, if allowed to grow, ruins the pasturage. But now that the deer have been removed, the pasturage is very much worse than it was.
Every person who has had experience of the deer forests in the North, knows what is the result of not keeping down the rank herbage. Therefore, so far from the commoners having entered into a bargain with the Crown in 1851, I believe that they had considerable reason to complain of what was then done. But what was done in 1851? I venture to say that the arrangement made then was wrong in principle, and that when it came to be carried out in practice, the practice was worse than the principle, and that it was absolutely broken down. The principle of that arrangement was this—by way of following out the precedent which had been established with the view of promoting the growth of timber, Parlia-

of that precedent to an extent that had never been contemplated by those who were responsible for it, and to sanction the enclosure of portions of the Forest, not for the purposes of the growth of timber, but to compensate the Crown for giving up the deer. Now, if it was intended to have compensated the Crown at all, it would have been much better to give it a specific allotment of land. Nothing could have been worse than to give the Crown a rolling right to go from part to part of the Forest and enclose land here and there and to plant firs and other trees to an enormous extent. Every person who visits the New Forest is shocked to see miles of hideous, black, unsightly fir plantations which even when they have come to maturity will scarcely repay the cost of planting, and which have absolutely ruined for ever the best pasture land in the Forest. Even if these trees were cut down at once it would be impossible, without going to an enormous expense, to restore the land for the purposes of pasture. And what has been the result of the arrangement? Why, the powers given to the Crown by the Act of 1851 could not be exercised. Under the provisions of the Act these enclosures were not to be made at the mere will of the Crown, but with the consent of the justices of the peace in the neighbourhood; and the result has been that in a large number of cases the Crown has been unable to obtain that consent. Therefore, the present position of things is this—that the Crown has, in law, a rolling right to make plantations all over the Forest, but that that right cannot be exercised. I think that the House will agree with me that that is a position of things which ought not to be allowed to continue. Under this Bill an absolute and an incontestable right is given to the Crown to enclose over a space of 18,000 acres, which it is calculated will about compensate the Crown for the rights to enclose over other parts of the Forest which will be taken from it. The remaining rights of the Crown over the rest of the Forest are rights which will only be of value—and then of very considerable value—if ever disafforestation should be made—and these rights the Bill expressly reserves. It appears to me that the recommendation of the Committee of the other House upon which this Bill is based is a very fair settlement of this difficult question. Something has been done. Things can no longer be as they are. The Government, as the noble Duke has said, render the rights of the Bill will enable the Crown to exercise rights which it cannot exercise now, and it will save all that the Crown now possesses. It has been done in regard to the forest in the winter heyning in the same course as that recommended by the Committee of your Lordships. Then, again, the noble Duke's objection to the Court of Chancery at present, the Crown is one of the four; in future it will be one of seven. I trust that in these circumstances, your Lordships will support the appointment of committees to investigate further inquiry—it has been submitted to every kind of inquiry that you will give effect to the provisions of the Bill which have been almost unanimously approved by the House, and which, I think, is wise and sound.

EARL GRANVILLE: I feel himself competent to make a legal argument, while I leave to the learned Lord on the other side of the Chamber to see that the Crown is not to lose away its rights over the Forest to the extent that I thought it was the duty of the Government to prevent the deterioration of the Crown's rights. I would not be told that the Government, having large estates, have an object in dealing with the Forest as to be to preserve it and its natural beauty and peculiar charm, and that the Bill signifies that. No provision was made for the loss of timber; and yet the Department had not acted judiciously in the directions it had meted out, tending to the loss of a Public Department, the control of the Forest, the monies of the Forest, far indeed from preserving for the state of the Forest. He could not see what was to be referring mittee. Their Lordships were asked to reverse the decision to which they came only nine years ago after careful consideration, and before doing that he thought they should have had an opportunity of going through the Bill by means of a Select Committee.

VISCOUNT EVERSLEY said, that after the able and exhaustive speech of the noble and learned Lord on the Wool-sack, it would be presumptuous in him to detain their Lordships by many observations on the Bill then under discussion; but he hoped he might be allowed to say that, having taken great interest in the operation of the Deer Removal Act of 1851, he readily accepted this Bill as a just and reasonable settlement of the claims of those who had rights of Common over the New Forest and the Crown, for it must not be forgotten that over and above the 18,000 acres which were to be reserved for planting, the Crown would have the benefit of all the self-sown timber grown in other parts of the Forest, which was said to be rapidly increasing in consequence of the removal of the deer.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET withdrew his Amendment.

The said Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn: Then the original Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

POOR LAW—THE BOARDING-OUT SYSTEM.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD asked the noble Duke the Lord President of the Council, Whether the attention of the Local Government Board has been called to the cruelties inflicted upon two pauper children boarded out by the Nantwich Guardians to a farm labourer and his wife named Sudlow; and, whether the Poor Law Inspectors have made any reports as to the working of the boarding-out system in the case of pauper children?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he was not at all sorry that the noble Lord should have put a Question upon such a very distressing case as that to which he referred. The Local Government Board had required an Inspector to report upon the case, and it appeared from the evidence that it was the grossest neglect. The circumstances under which these children were boarded out were somewhat as follows:—It appeared that two years ago the Guardians of the Nantwich Union, contrary to the advice of the Local Government Department, came to the resolution to board out their orphan and deserted children, in order to save themselves the expense of building, or uniting with another Union in building, a suitable place for them. The Guardians, it is true, in July, 1875, prepared some rules under the Orders of the Local Government Board of 1870, in reference to boarding-out of children; and if those rules had been properly attended to, this lamentable occurrence would not have taken place. One of those rules was that no child should live more than two miles distant from the school or the church. That rule had been entirely neglected, as these children were sent to live at least 2½ miles away, and they never went to the school or the church. A gentleman connected with the Union, who was the only visitor in the district, requested the relieving officer to report upon the condition of the children. He did, accordingly, report for one or two quarters, and then made no further inquiry. The subject of boarding-out had undergone much inquiry by the Local Government Department. The system had been urged upon the Government, but there was some difficulty in framing the Orders. Two Orders of 1870 dealt with the matter—one Order related to boarding-out within the Union, and the other related to it without the Union. At present, there were 306 children boarded out without the Union, and 2,095 boarded out within the Union. Where they were boarded out without the Union, it was a much better system, as certain things had to be done in compliance with the regulations of the Local Government Board—for example, the parties were called upon to give an undertaking that the children should be well looked after; and they were also under the inspection of the Visiting Committee. But where the children were boarded out within the Union, the Guardians were paramount, and the Local Government Board could not interfere with the arrangements made. He might state that the subject of boarding-out was one which had much engaged the attention of the Local Government Board, and the Inspectors had been called upon to report as to the soundness of the system. In some cases, the Reports were satisfactory, and in others not so; and in those cases the Guardians had been ordered to take the children back to the workhouse in order to their being properly cared for. There had been considerable difficulty in drawing up in detail the proper Orders in respect of boarding-out within the Union; but he believed that his right hon. Friend had now overcome that difficulty. He had issued an Order to all the Local Government Board Inspectors, asking for their comments upon it, and to point out whether they thought the Order would work well or not. His right hon. Friend was now waiting for the Inspectors' Reports, and as soon as he received them the Order would be put into a practical form, and it was hoped would prevent the recurrence of such a lamentable case to that to which the noble Lord had called attention.

TASMANIAN MAIN LINE RAILWAY BILL. [Lords.]

THIRD READING.

MR. RAIKES explained, that he had, on a former occasion, stated that a sum of £117,000 had been spent in floating the company, and that Mr. Albert Grant appeared to be under the impression that what he said was that he had received that amount. He had since investigated the matter, and he found that it was computed that a sum variously estimated from £103,000 to £170,000 had been expended, if not wasted, in promoting the company; but he also found that Mr. Grant was stated to have received only the ordinary and legitimate commission of 2½ per cent for having introduced the debentures, and that there was nothing to warrant the conclusion that he had appropriated the sum mentioned to his own purposes.

Bill read the third time, and passed, with Amendments.

QUESTIONS.

SCOTCH HERRING FISHERIES. QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a letter from Captain Kerr, of the steamship "Gael," which appeared in The "Glasgow Herald" of the 19th instant, describing the extent to which the destruction of herring fry is carried on in the Firth of Clyde and the neighbouring waters; and whether the statements in that letter are substantially correct that the greater part of the fish so killed lately have been too small to be taken ashore, and that even of those taken ashore great numbers are thrown away as unfit for sale; and, if so, whether, considering the scarcity of herrings in that district, any steps can be taken to prevent for the future the wasteful destruction of immature fish?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The attention of the President of the Board of Trade has been directed to this question. I am not able to give the House any precise information as to the correctness of the statements contained in Captain Kerr's letter; but there can be no doubt that there is a large destruction of herring fry in the manner described. In spite of this, however, the take of herrings in this district has largely increased. The House is probably aware that the Government is about to send a small Commission to Scotland to inquire into certain complaints which have reached them as to the fisheries, and this subject will be fully investigated.

NAVY—RETIRED NAVAL OFFICERS. QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether, in the event of officers on the Retired Lists of the Navy being called again into active service, the Government would entertain any applications made by them for compensation for pecuniary loss incurred by their being obliged to give up any business or other civil employment which they might be engaged in at the time; whether such officers so called upon would be appointed to serve according to their rank and seniority on the Retired Lists; and, whether, on officers being retired either compulsorily or at their own request, it was made known to them that they would be liable to be called again into active service, in the same way as information to the like effect is communicated to seamen and marine pensioners under Article 23, at page 245, of the Queen's Regulations for the Government of the Navy?

MR. A. F. EGERTON, in reply, said, that in the event of officers on the Retired Lists of the Navy being called again into active service, they would not be entitled to claim compensation for giving up civil employments in which they were now engaged. The Admiralty would reserve to themselves the same power of selection which they exercised according to the Queen's Regulations, and they would be dealt with according to their respective ranks.

TRADES UNIONS—SOUTH YORKSHIRE MINERS' ASSOCIATION.—QUESTION.

MR. SANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the decision of Mr. Serjeant Tindal Atkinson, County Court Judge at Barnsley, as reported in the "Yorkshire Post" of June the 15th, as to the funds of the South Yorkshire Miners' Association for the benefit of widows and orphans, which decision affects most seriously the future maintenance of three hundred widows and five to six hundred orphans, and having regard to the deprivation and loss likely to ensue to these unfortunate people who were led to believe that they had some provision to fall back upon in time of need, whether he will interfere on the part of the Government by instituting an investigation into the management of this association, with a view to inquiry whether the funds have been in any way misappropriated from the purpose for which they were subscribed?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he very much regretted the position in which the particular society in question found itself, for the sake of those persons who had been practically deprived of the benefits which they might reasonably have expected to receive from it. The decision of the learned Judge was, however, he believed, perfectly correct, so far as the law of the matter was concerned. He was advised that the effect of a contrary decision would be that, if trades unions were brought within the law, proceedings might be instituted in the Courts to compel workmen to abstain from going to work, or, if they continued on strike, to compel trustees to apply their funds for the maintenance of strikes.

METROPOLIS — SAINT MARGARET'S CHURCH—THE ALBERT MEMORIAL.

QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government has subscribed towards the restoration of Saint Margaret's Church; and, if so, whether the restoration may be postponed until the Report of the Committee on Public Buildings has been laid upon the Table, as it may then be considered desirable, if a suitable approach to the Houses of Parliament is to be made, to remove Saint Margaret's, in order to open to view Westminster Abbey; and, whether it is true, as stated in last Monday's papers, that the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851 have sold ground on which it is proposed to erect a building so lofty that it will greatly injure the effect of the Albert Memorial?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he would answer the second Question first. The Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851 had recently leased some land in the Kensington Road; but they were exercising great care to prevent the erection of buildings so lofty as to injure the effect of certain monuments, and they had refused to permit the erection of a building which would possibly have the effect of injuring the appearance of the Albert Memorial. With regard to Saint Margaret's Church, a sum of £1,500 had been voted for its restoration, as had been done in former years, owing to the interest which was taken in it by the House. The restoration would be carried out under the direction of the authorities of the parish, and the Government had nothing to do with postponing it, or accelerating it. The works were not likely to be undertaken before the Recess, so that in all probability the Report referred to would be submitted beforehand.

TOWNLANDS AND TOWNS (IRELAND)—
ALPHABETICAL INDEX.—QUESTION.

MR. HEYGATE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether there exists any statutory obligation for the printing and publishing of the bulky volume, headed "Alphabetical Index of Townlands and Towns of Ireland," in connection with the Census of 1871, price 8s. 6d., lately issued to Members; and, if not, whether the Treasury considers that the expense incurred by such publication, six years after the last Census, is justified by its general interest either for Parliament or the public?

MR. W. H. SMITH: There is no statutory obligation of publishing an alphabetical index of townships and towns in Ireland. The information is, I am informed, necessary for some public Departments in Ireland, and, therefore, it was represented that it should be in existence; but I agree that it is not expedient that so bulky a volume should be presented and distributed as a Parliamentary Paper, and I may state that it shall not again occur.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—LORD DERBY'S DESPATCH OF THE 6TH OF MAY.

QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to the European Nations referred to in the Despatch of the Earl of Derby of the 6th of May, Whether any one of such Nations, and, if any, which, has expressed concurrence in the policy announced in that Despatch, restricting the operations of Russia in the present contest; and, whether any European Nation or Power, other than and except that of the Papacy, has expressed disapproval of the action of Russia against Turkey?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I can only say that I do not think it would be convenient to answer the Question.

NAVY—THE NEW NAVAL COLLEGE—
THE SITE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. EDWARDS asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether there is any truth in the report that the Admiralty have decided to erect a Naval College at Dartmouth, and that the Grant to be asked for in the Naval Estimates is to be taken for that purpose?

MR. A. F. EGERTON, in reply, said, the Admiralty had come to the conclusion that Dartmouth was the best site for the proposed Naval College. He was, however, in communication with his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, from whom he expected an answer immediately, as to whether the Vote for it should be proposed this Session, and if the hon. Gentleman would repeat his Question on Monday, he would probably be able to inform the hon. Gentleman of the final decision of the Admiralty on the subject.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the hon. Gentleman, Whether a distinct pledge had not on three different occasions been given by the First Lord of the Admiralty, that no decision would be come to on the subject until an opportunity for full discussion with respect to it had been afforded the House?

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, he was not aware what were the exact words which had been used by the First Lord of the Admiralty; but, on referring to the Reports of the debates, he was unable to find anything implying an absolute promise on the part of his right hon. Friend on the subject. So far as he himself was concerned, what he had said on one occasion, in reply to a Question which had been put to him, was that he would assent to the postponement of the Vote for the site for a Naval College, in order that there might be an opportunity of having the matter fully discussed.

the House. Well, that being so, it was still open to the House to discuss the question when the Vote came on; but the Admiralty were bound to arrive at a decision in the matter before submitting the Vote.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked, Whether the hon. Gentleman thought having a discussion on the question before a Vote was taken was the same thing as having a discussion when the Vote was brought before the House?

MR. A. F. EGERTON could only repeat that he thought the Admiralty itself was bound to come to a decision before it made any proposal at all.

PUBLIC HEALTH (METROPOLIS) BILL. QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he will cause a memorandum to be prepared for the information of the House showing the general effect of the Public Health (Metropolis) Bill on the existing Law, and specially indicating what clauses are taken from Acts now in force outside the Metropolis and what clauses are taken from the Acts now in force in the Metropolis; and further explaining what controlling power and authority now vested in the Secretary of State for the Home Department or Privy Council is proposed to be transferred to the President of the Local Government Board; and what powers hitherto possessed by the local authorities are proposed to be modified under the provisions of the Bill?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: I may inform the hon. Member that I have already given directions for a Memorandum to be prepared showing the clauses which are taken from the Acts now in force in the Metropolis, whether with or without alteration, those which are from Acts not so in force, and those which are new. Much of this information is already given in the marginal notes of the Bill. But when he asks me to state what power now vested in the Secretary of State or Privy Council is proposed to be transferred to myself, I must reply that the Bill does not propose to transfer any such power; because all the powers of the Secretary of State and of the Privy Council under the Acts consolidated by the Bill were so transferred by the Local Government Board Act, 1871.

I am surprised that there should be any misunderstanding on this point; because it was only in January last that, in the exercise of the powers so transferred, I caused a circular letter to be addressed to the Vestries and District Boards of the Metropolis, on the subject of providing hospital accommodation under one of the Acts now proposed to be consolidated, and no exception was taken by them in reply to the authority under which I so addressed them. There is substantially no modification of the powers now vested in the local authorities. On the contrary, some fresh powers are given to them by the Bill. The only new powers proposed to be conferred on the Local Government Board are with respect to the provision of mortuaries and the approval of voluntary arrangements between two or more authorities for providing joint hospital accommodation.

NAVY — DOCKYARD ENGINEERS AT MALTA.—QUESTION.

MR. J. COWEN asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If a Petition has been received from the Engineers in the Dockyard at Malta, asking that the hours they work, in consequence of the heat of the climate, should be reduced from ten to nine hours per day; if nine hours is not the length for a day's work for Engineers in the Dockyards of this Country; and if he could state whether the demand of the Malta Engineers will be complied with?

MR. A. F. EGERTON, in reply, said, it was true that the Petition referred to by the hon. Member had been received. It was also true that nine hours was the length of a day's work for engineers in the home dockyards. It had been decided to offer the Malta engineers a reduction in the hours of work coupled with a corresponding reduction of pay. This was the course adopted in the case of the home dockyards.

SUCCESSIONS DUTY ACT — DOUBLE DUTIES—"THE ATTORNEY GENERAL v. CHARLTON."—QUESTION.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN asked Mr. Attorney General, If his attention has been called to the decision of the Court of Appeal on Saturday last in the case of "The Attorney General v. Charlton and others," as to Succession

Duty, in which the Court stated, that, but for certain decisions of the House of Lords on the Succession Duty Act, they would have held that the lower and not the higher duties, as claimed by the Crown, were payable by the defendants, and, consequently, would have given judgment against the Attorney General in the case before the Court; if it be the fact, that the Lord Chief Justice of England, in giving judgment in that case, stated that the decisions of the House of Lords relied upon by the Crown, were "clearly wrong, and proceeded on technical grounds contrary to the real meaning of and the spirit of the Act;" and that the House of Lords in these decisions had fallen into "a great and fatal error," and "had misconstrued the Act;" and, whether, having regard to the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, and the judgments of Lord Justice James, Lord Justice Bramwell, and Lord Justice Brett, concurring with him, it is his intention to introduce at once a Bill to declare the Law, so as to overrule the decisions of the House of Lords, referred to by the Court of Appeal, which compelled that Court to decide in favour of the Crown, against their own unanimous opinion, in a matter of taxation affecting Her Majesty's subjects?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: This case of "the Attorney General v. Charlton" was one of a very complicated and perplexing character. It was, by desire of the Courts, argued five times—three times before the Exchequer Division and twice before the Court of Appeal. I was one of the counsel for the Crown, and my attention was therefore called to the judgment pronounced by the Court of Appeal on Saturday last. The Lord Chief Justice, in the course of his judgment, did make some such observations as those alluded to in my right hon. and learned Friend's Question with reference to the decisions of the House of Lords, and all the learned Judges stated, I believe, that they felt themselves constrained to pronounce the judgment which they gave by the authority of those decisions; but I do not think it at all clear that if the Court of Appeal had not felt obliged to follow the judgment of the House of Lords, they would have decided that the Crown was entitled to a lower duty than the duty claimed. It is quite possible that the Court might have come to the conclusion that the case fell within Section 4 of the Successions Duty Act, and that double duties were payable as under the Legacy Acts. It will be open to the appellant to carry this case to the House of Lords; and until I know whether this course is to be adopted, I cannot decide whether it will be desirable to introduce any Bill on the subject.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—SCOTCH BILLS.

QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON (for Mr. W. HOLMS) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What course he proposes to take with reference to the four General Public Bills for Scotland which have been introduced this Session, but not one of which has yet been discussed in Committee, viz., the Poor Law, Prisons, Sheriff Courts, and Roads and Bridges Bills; and, seeing that the last-named Bill was specially mentioned in Her Majesty's Speech as a measure of importance, what day he would give for its consideration?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Government are very anxious to proceed with some at least of these Bills, and I can only say that we are anxious to find early days for proceeding with them. But the hon. Gentleman and the House are well aware we are in a difficulty at present because of the strong expression of opinion which was passed by the House that we ought to proceed with the Estimates as quickly as we can. There are also, as I mentioned the other day, two important measures—the East Indian Loan Bill, and the South African Confederation Bill—which it is desirable to proceed with. I will only say, therefore, that we will bring the Bills on as quickly as we can. To the remark of the hon. Member who put the Question, that not one of the Scotch Bills has been discussed in Committee, I must take some exception; because, although the Prisons Bill has not literally been discussed in Committee, an arrangement was made that it should stand over till the English Bill had been discussed, and that it should be reprinted in the form of the English Bill. That has been done, and therefore I suppose the discussion of the Scotch Bill will not occupy much time. The Roads and Bridges Bill has been committed pro forma in order to introduce various Amendments. It will probably be distributed to hon. Members shortly. We shall proceed with that Bill as quickly as possible, and with the others also.

ARMY—TERRITORIAL TITLES TO REGIMENTS.—QUESTION.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will state to the House whether Her Majesty's Government intend to carry into effect the recommendation of the Militia Committee which sat last year with respect to giving territorial titles to the regiments of the Army, and depriving them of their numerical titles?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, it was not the intention to deprive the regiments of their numerical titles; but to arrange them on the footing proposed by the Commander-in-Chief in 1873.

FISHERIES (OYSTERS, CRABS, AND LOBSTERS) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is aware that the 12th section of the Fisheries (Oysters, Crabs, and Lobsters) Bill re-enacts, as regards France, an Act of Parliament which has been repealed and was left out of the revised edition of the statutes?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes, Sir, my right hon. Friend is aware of the fact referred to in the Question. And the reason is this—The Fishery Convention of 1839 between England and France was intended to remain in force until the later Convention of 1867 between the same countries came into operation. Unfortunately, difficulties have arisen, and that Convention is not yet in force. In these circumstances, it is proposed that the Act of 1843 which confirmed the first Convention, and which was repealed in 1868, should be temporarily revived until the day when the later Convention actually comes into operation.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—ROMAN CATHOLICS.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Lord Advocate, If there has recently been an investigation into certain charges of unfair treatment of Roman Catholics in judicial proceedings at Irvine in Ayrshire; and, if he will state the result of the investigation, or lay upon the Table any Papers connected with it?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: In Irvine there are a considerable number of Catholics and Orangemen among the working classes, and I regret to say that some time ago these parties gave each other considerable annoyance, and their differences occasionally led to breaches of the peace. In a recent case the offenders were prosecuted at the instance of the police authorities before the magistrates of the borough of Irvine. Complaint was made to me that a certain amount of unfairness had been shown by those magistrates in awarding unduly lenient sentences to the Orangemen tried before them. I considered it to be my duty to instruct the Procurator Fiscal of the Sheriff's Court, who is a Government official, to inquire and report to me the circumstances of these various cases in which unfairness was said to have been signally displayed. The result of the examination and investigation having been reported to me I have now to state, in answer to the hon. Member, that there seems no ground for imputing any want of fairness or any partiality to those justices in the discharge of a very difficult and delicate duty.

MR. ANDERSON: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has not answered my last Question—Will he lay the Papers upon the Table?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: I understood the Question was put alternatively. I do not think the Papers are of such a character that they ought to be laid upon the Table; but I will communicate with the hon. Member on the subject.

ARMY—MAJOR DE DOHSE.—QUESTION.

MAJOR O'GORMAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is his intention to recommend for employment in Her Majesty's Military Service, Major de Dohsé, late of the German Legion (British)?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY replied in the negative.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF FRANCES ISABELLA STALLAND.—QUESTION.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to a trial for murder which took place at the Winchester Assizes on Monday the 2nd instant, at which Frances Isabella Stalland, aged 20, was convicted of the wilful murder of her illegitimate child, and to the report as given in the "Standard" newspaper, that the jury, after considering their verdict for forty minutes, found the prisoner Guilty, with a strong recommendation to mercy on account of her youth, her desertion by the father of the child, and the general circumstances surrounding the case; and that the judge, on passing sentence of Death, said he would forward the recommendation of the jury to the Secretary of State, but that neither he (the judge) nor the prisoner could expect that the sentence would be remitted; and, whether it is consistent with the prerogative of the Crown that the judge should say that he could not expect such recommendation of the jury would be attended to?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I have no official report whatever of anything that fell from the learned Judge who tried this case, nor do I at the present moment know anything about the merits of the case, because the usual report has not yet reached me. But reading the Question as it is placed on the Paper, I should say all that the learned Judge meant to convey was this—that he did not himself agree with the recommendation of the jury, and would not probably back it up to the Secretary of State. I am sure that neither the learned Judge who tried the case, nor any Judge on the Bench, would for a moment think of interfering with the Prerogative of the Crown.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS: I wish to ask, Whether the Government, having regard to the large amount of time which has been consumed this Session in discussing the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill, are prepared to take any steps in order to prevent the loss of that time?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I really do not see what steps the Government can take. We have done what was in our power, in the way of affording one day which was at the command of the Government, and the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), in concert with the Government, gave another day. I am sorry that those days have not led to any decisive results; but in the present state of Business, and considering the obligations of the Government, I do not see that I can at the present time make any other proposal with regard to the matter.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—REFLECTIONS IN THIS HOUSE.—QUESTION.

MR. PULESTON, who had the following Notice of Motion on the Paper:—

"That in Committee of the whole House, no Member have power to move more than once either that the Chairman do report Progress or that the Chairman leave the Chair, and that no Member who has made one of those Motions have power to move the other in the same Committee," said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer a Question of which I have given him private Notice—Whether, in view of such scenes as took place the other night, in pursuance of a system of obstruction which is now becoming a standing reproach, offensive to the dignity of the House and antagonistic to the best interests of the nation, the Government are prepared—["Order!"]

MR. CALLAN: I rise to a point of Order. I beg to ask, Mr. Speaker, Whether a Question which so palpably transgresses the Rules of the House, and which the Clerks at the Table, under your direction, will not receive, should be put on a subject affecting the privileges of Members of this House?

MR. SPEAKER: According to the ordinary practice of the House no Question can be put involving matter of argument. I think some of the phrases contained in the Question as they reached me did so contain matter of argument.

MR. PULESTON: I bow to your decision, Sir, and I will therefore only ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will afford such facilities as will enable me to bring forward the Motion which stands in my name, or whether Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to take similar or other means to effect the same object?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Mr. Speaker, my hon. Friend has mentioned to me, before the commencement of the Business, that he proposed to put a Question to me with reference to the Notice which stands in his name for this evening, and which, probably, will not be reached till a late hour. The Question is whether we could give him any facility for bringing that question under consideration, or whether the Government themselves have any proposals to make upon the subject. The hon. Gentleman did not state to me the reasons upon which he proposed to bring forward that Question; but, of course, it would be affectation not to see that there is some connection between this Question having been put on the Paper at the present time and the proceedings which took place in this House a few nights ago. Well, with regard to that matter I wish to say, on behalf of the Government, that we are above all things anxious to promote in any way we can the convenience and proper conduct of Business in this House; and we consider that it may from time to time be desirable and necessary, as the character of the Business that comes before this House alters, as larger numbers of Questions are brought forward, as the nature of the discussions varies—it may from time to time be necessary to revise and reconsider the Rules under which our Business is conducted. At the same time, we are very conscious that those Rules are the result of many years and generations of experience; and we therefore feel that great care and pains ought to be exercised in making alterations in them. I think it would be particularly to be regretted if any alterations were proposed or discussed under this feeling—I do not like the word which was rising to my lips—but under any feeling of annoyance with reference to a particular proceeding. I am unwilling at the present time to express any opinion upon what took place the other night. I think the judgment of this House and of the country is tolerably well formed upon that subject. I think we might only cause irritation and hinder the progress—the satisfactory progress—of Business by discussing what really needs no discussion. Therefore I would venture to express a hope that in what I am now saying I may not bring about a desultory or irregular discussion. But I would say, with reference to the Question of my hon. Friend, and to the Notice which stands in his name upon the Paper, that the Government have recently—before those transactions took place and still more since—given a great deal of attention to this subject; and we are certainly of opinion that it may be desirable, calmly and with due consideration, to examine some portion of the Orders of the House, especially with regard to the question to which my hon. Friend refers—the question of Adjournment, or of reporting Progress, when the House is in Committee. And I may say that the particular proposal which my hon. Friend makes is one which, upon the face of it, commands our approval; and I think that, in substance at least, it would probably command the approval of a very large majority, if not of the whole, of the House, because I take it it only applies to the case of a Committee a Rule which works well in this House as a whole. At the same time, I think that, under the circumstances which I mentioned in the first instance, and bearing in mind the fact that it might be necessary, if we were altering our Rules at all, to make, perhaps, some other alterations besides this, and that it is undesirable to have frequent and desultory discussions upon such a matter—I think it would be better that we should not be in a hurry, and not attempt at present to deal with a question of this sort. My own opinion is, that the best course we could take would be to carry on our Business under the Rules which are at present in force, and to let us take time. The Government will undertake carefully to consider this matter, in consultation with yourself, Sir, and with the other authorities of the House, in order that we may be able next Session to propose a careful and well-considered revision of such parts of our Rules as may seem to require it. I may remind the House that there has been more than one Committee on Public Business, and that those Committees have made recommendations of an important character, some of which have been partly adopted, but several of which have never been adopted by the House. I think the recommendations of those Committees deserve serious consideration, and they shall receive it; and I think that, upon the whole, we should be best consulting the convenience and dignity of the House if we were at present to let this matter stand over. I trust we shall have no repetition of such scenes, upon which I do not wish to say more than I have already said; and I need not assure my hon. Friend that the convenience and dignity of this House are, and always will be,

MR. WHALLEY: Sir, I wish to make a few observations in the nature of a personal explanation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the observations that he has addressed to the House, has done so in carefully worded and measured terms—"Order!"

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member proposes to make a personal explanation, no doubt the House will receive it with its usual indulgence; but if the hon. Member merely rises to make some remarks on the Answer which has been given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he will not be in Order.

MR. WHALLEY: As I understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he imputed to those who took part in the proceedings of the other night—"Order!" If I am to be interrupted in this way I really do not know how to make my explanation; but I must endeavour by some means to protect myself, and I do not know how I can do it better than by moving the Adjournment of the House. After having sat for a quarter of a century in this House, I cannot submit to the imputations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and though conveyed in such measured terms they raise considerations most unjust and most unfair towards me, on which I claim on personal grounds to offer some reply. It is the more important that I should do so, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer says that he will not proceed to act on the Motion of the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston), relative to the privilege of moving to report Progress, or that the Chairman do leave the Chair. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member having proposed to make a personal explanation is not entitled, as I have already said, to comment on the Answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. WHALLEY: The observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were wholly uncalled for. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is out of Order in the course he is pursuing; and if he disregards the ruling of the Chair I shall have to submit his conduct to the judgment of the House.

MR. WHALLEY: I must make one more attempt, and after that I will acquiesce in what may be the desire of the House. I say that I cannot continue to discharge my duty in this House under the rebuke which has been directly or indirectly cast upon me.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I rise to Order. It is only by the indulgence of the House that hon. Members are entitled to make personal explanations, and it is an indulgence that is never refused. I think that the hon. Member for Peterborough, in proceeding to make some remarks on the Answer I recently gave to the House, is entirely exceeding the privilege of Parliament, and can scarcely be considered as acting respectfully to you, Sir, after the observations you have made, in persisting in proceeding in the way he is doing.

MR. WHALLEY: My reason for proceeding is that the observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer assume that those who took part in the recent proceedings of this House are justly exposed to the censure and indignation of this House and the country. The Government, in the part which they took, and the right hon. Gentleman still more so, I venture to say, in the course which he has taken, are justly exposed to greater complaint on the part of those hon. Members than—"Order!"

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: I rise to Order. Is not the hon. Member for Peterborough acting exactly contrary, Mr. Speaker, to your orders?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is altogether disregarding the injunctions that have fallen from the Chair, and unless the House thinks that I should act otherwise, seeing that we are now engaged upon the Questions before the House, and that the hon. Member by his conduct interrupts the Business of the House, I shall, with the concurrence of the House, call on such hon. Members who are desirous of putting Questions in the ordinary course of Business to do so; and I call on the hon. Member for Peterborough to resume his seat.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—PRACTICE OF THIS HOUSE.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS: Sir, I wish to direct attention to the Motion of the hon. Member (Mr. Blake), and to ask you, Mr. Speaker, Whether, as the terms of the Motion contain imputations upon the conduct of an hon. Member, and would involve serious consequences, inasmuch as if the House concurred it would involve a direct Vote of Censure, and as the appearance of the Motion day after day upon the Notice Paper could not but be painful to the feelings of the hon. Member concerned, and also having regard to certain precedents which, however, it would be unnecessary to cite, whether this is not a Motion of that character, which, as a matter of Privilege, ought to take precedence of the other Orders of the Day?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member asks whether the Question of which the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Blake) has given Notice is of such a character that it ought to be dealt with as a question of Privilege. The House is aware that, according to the general practice of the House, no question of this character is dealt with as a matter of Privilege unless it is urgent in point of time, and directly affects the Privileges of this House or of Members of this House. The Notice of the hon. Member for Leominster challenges two statements alleged to have been made by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), one on the 21st of April, and the other on the 20th of June last. It appears to me that this Question, having regard to the question of time, cannot be regarded as a question of Privilege, because it is not urgent in point of time; but if the House should think fit to entertain the Motion at once as a matter of Privilege, the subject is one which would warrant that course.

MR. BLAKE: I wish to ask you, Sir, if it is competent for the Motion which stands in my name to be then discussed with the consent of the House? It is true that some time has elapsed since the speeches referred to were made, but they are still in circulation in the newspapers. I think it is a matter that should be considered by Parliament as early as possible.

MR. PARNELL: I rise to Order, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I may be allowed to say that if it is thought desirable by the House that I should make an explanation in reference to either of the speeches referred to, I do not wish in any way to stand in the way of the House in getting that explanation.

MR. SPEAKER: I must inform the hon. Member that it is irregular to discuss the Motion of the hon. Member for Leominster unless the House should have previously signified its pleasure that it should be discussed as a question of Privilege.

MR. BLAKE: I wish to move that the matter be now considered as a question of Privilege.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I ask the hon. Member whether he thinks in his own mind that it can be brought forward and treated as a matter of Privilege?

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £132,000, Army Reserve Force Pay and Allowances.

COLONEL MURE called the attention of the Secretary of State for War to the fact that in those branches of the Service in which the longest time was required to make a soldier the Reserves were weakest. In the Artillery, for instance, there were almost no reserves at all; so, also, in the Cavalry; while a large portion of the Infantry were not of an age fit for service abroad. He knew a regiment about 900 strong, in which there were 500 young fellows, a vast number of whom were not more than 17 or 18 years of age, so that if it became necessary to send that regiment abroad it would be found that at least 25 per cent of the men were in consequence of their youth unfit for foreign service. The same state of things would recur which happened during the Crimean War, when, as Lord Raglan said, vast numbers of young men were sent out to fill our ranks, who died off like flies. He hoped the matter would be carefully and honestly looked into. He admitted that the class of recruits had improved physically, educationally, and morally. They were a fine class of young men, but they were not fit to go into arduous foreign service.

MR. WHALLEY said, that to non-military men this question of Reserves was one of the great questions of the day. The schemes of Lord Cardwell had ended in disappointment, as he at the time the Bill for the Abolition of Purchase was before the House prophesied would be the case. The hon. Member was proceeding to refer to the Volunteer Force, the Vote for which had been the subject of discussion on a former occasion, when—

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Gentleman was not in Order in alluding to a question which was not within the scope of the present Vote.

MR. WHALLEY next referred to the official Report recently made to the War Office respecting the Volunteers at the Easter Review.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the hon. Member was not in Order.

MR. WHALLEY said, he was speaking about the Reserves, by which he meant that military force that the country had at its command in case of emergency—namely, the Volunteers. ["Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Vote before the Committee was not for the Auxiliary and Reserve Forces, but for the Army Reserve Force.

MR. WHALLEY presumed he might ask the Secretary of State for War what steps he proposed to take in compliance with the official Report already alluded to in order to render the Reserve Forces more efficient?

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT rose to Order, asking whether the hon. Member was not now for the third time pursuing a discussion which the Chairman had ruled was outside the Question before the Committee, and whether the Committee would not empower the Chairman to put the Vote notwithstanding that the hon. Member was on his legs?

THE CHAIRMAN said, there was no doubt the hon. Member's remarks were still outside the Question; but he felt sure that after the intimation which had been given the hon. Member would not persist in that course.

MR. WHALLEY remarked that he was extremely obliged to the Chairman for his courtesy, and could assure the Committee that he did him no more than justice in assuming that he had no desire to travel beyond the limits of the Question. He really felt totally unable, however, to discharge according to his conscience the duty that was required of him in the exigency of the case if he was not allowed to make these references in connection with the Reserve.

MR. J. HOLMS did think the Committee and the country were entitled to know clearly and specifically the expectations of the War Office as to the bringing up of the Reserve Forces. According to the Vote, the number would be 15,000 a-year.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was afraid the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Mure) and the hon. Member (Mr. J. Holms) were not in the House when, on a former occasion, he went into the subjects to which they had referred. It was fully expected at the War Office that more men would be passed into the Reserves than had been anticipated. It was a matter of necessity that the regiments mentioned by the hon. and gallant Gentleman should be pretty full of recruits; but it was certainly not intended to send young inexperienced men abroad. Only fit men would be sent out. He had entered fully into that question on a previous evening. As to men going into the Reserves, he was not able to force them to enter at the desired age. There were between 60,000 and 80,000 who were engaged to enter in their turn; he could not compel them to enter; but he was endeavouring, through the commanding officers, to induce men to join the Reserves earlier than they would otherwise do.

Vote agreed to.

In reply to Mr. GOURLEY,

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, there was nothing extraordinary in the item for the cost of watching the dockyards and various establishments—a duty which was undertaken by the Metropolitan Police, but of course had to be paid for by the Government.

SIR ANDREW LUSK, referring to the item of £4,940 for police employed under the Contagious Diseases Prevention Act, asked how many policemen were so employed?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY could not give the number at that moment, but said they were employed at all the places—and there were a good many—where the Act was enforced, and they were necessarily picked men.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £2,986,000, Provisions, Forage, Fuel, Transport, and other Services.

CAPTAIN O'BEIRNE complained of certain charges which unduly fell upon the Cavalry officers with respect to forage, and he suggested that a more liberal allowance should be made to them in reference to their horses.

The Chairman

GENERAL SHUTE was certain the great mass of the Cavalry officers preferred to be on the present footing. If their horses were provided by the country they would only get one each, but under the present arrangement, paying 8½d. a-day for forage, and getting good stable accommodation for their chargers, they usually kept three or four, and this was at once an advantage to themselves and to the country—to themselves, because it enabled them to hunt, giving them an “eye to country,” and improving their horsemanship, both qualifications so necessary to Cavalry officers; but if they had only one each, and that a Government horse, they would not be allowed to hunt, and would not be granted stable room or forage for more—to the country, because each Cavalry officer had now two or three broken chargers ready on shortest notice for field service. Cavalry officers had a grievance, however, when it was considered that the Horse Artillery officers paid only 6d. a-day for forage, whilst they were charged 8½d. The mounted officers of Infantry, also, had a grievance in connection with the allowance they received in lieu of forage, for they were actually out of pocket. He hoped these matters would be considered by the War Office.

MR. MELLOR called attention to the difference between the charges made by the Railway Companies for civilians and for soldiers—the difference being something like 33 per cent against the soldier—a state of things which he thought required to be remedied as speedily as possible, as the result would greatly reduce the cost of the Transport Service.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he felt with the hon. Member that the War Department was rather hardly used by the Railway Companies with respect to these charges. The terms for soldiers were fixed at an early period; since then the charges for third-class Parliamentary passengers had been reduced, while the same advantage had not been extended to soldiers, who therefore paid more than Parliamentary passengers—which he thought was a great hardship. The Select Committee which sat on the subject of the Railway Passenger Duty called attention to this distinction in favour of the War Department, but did not make any recommendation, thinking it rather outside the question which had been referred to them. He confessed he thought that considering what the State got from the railways they should also have looked to what the railways got from the State. With regard to the question of forage, the War Office had considered some suggestions on the subject, and the proposal he favourably entertained was that the forage allowance should be fixed, not at a precise sum, but according to locality and the price of forage in the place. He proposed, by next year, to make some additional allowance for the “first stall” in the stable, because officers lost 6d. if they took only one stall. At the same time, he could not promise to make the change which had been recommended with respect to Artillery officers, although they in every way deserved the consideration of the War Office. The present Vote could not be altered to meet the object in view.

(4.) £805,600, Clothing Establishments, Services and Supplies.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR expressed a hope that the Committee would be made acquainted with the amount of stores now actually available. A Supplementary Estimate for £200,000 had been voted by the House, in order to lay in a spare stock of woollens in readiness for any unusual demands. He had fully approved of this prudent precaution; but it was only fair that the House should have the means of knowing that this extra stock had been laid in, and was year by year maintained, and not used to make a diminution of the Army expenditure in some future year.

COLONEL MURE asked what was the nature of the new helmets for the Infantry?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he could not state precisely, but they might be described as blue helmets with brass band and brass spike.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £1,120,000, Supply, Manufacture, and Repair of Warlike and other Stores.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT wished to know from his noble Friend the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, what number of Martini-Henry rifles were in stock, and whether it was intended to arm all the Reserve Forces at once, as well as the Militia, with that rifle?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL, in reply, said, the total number of breechloading arms in store was 856,578, of which 377,558 were Martini-Henry, and 169,000 Snider rifles; and there were 310,000 Snider rifles in the hands of the Reserve Forces. It was intended to arm the Cavalry with the Martini-Henry carbine, but at present the pattern of the lock had not been decided upon. The whole Reserve would in time be armed with the Martini-Henry rifle. The carbines now in the hands of the Cavalry would, when the new carbines were ready, be distributed to the Yeomanry Cavalry.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK would move that the item for the Martini-Henry carbine be struck out, unless he received an assurance that in point of range it would be equal to the rifles carried by the Infantry.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL replied that the Martini-Henry carbine would not come into use this year at all. The question with regard to the lock had not yet been settled.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, the question he wanted to raise had no reference to the lock, but to the length of range. What he desired was that the carbine should be in all respects a long-range arm.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY assured the hon. and gallant Gentleman that the pattern of the Martini-Henry carbine had not yet been submitted to him. There was no Vote for it taken in the present Estimates, and in assenting to the Vote before them the Committee would in no way be bound to the adoption of that particular weapon in the future. He might add that he was quite as convinced as the hon. and gallant Gentleman of the importance of a long-range.

GENERAL SHUTE said, that so far as he could judge, Cavalry officers were quite satisfied with the carbine which it was proposed to give them, though it might not be of the full range of the Infantry. Its range was 1,000 yards, which was sufficient for nearly every practical purpose, and longer range would not compensate for the great inconvenience of having to carry a longer rifle on horseback. But the Lancers

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that the Army Estimates were swelled year by year by reason of the excessive demands made by the Navy for guns and ammunition and carriages. By what accident was it that £80,000 was included in the Naval Estimates as a sum to be given to the Navy for torpedoes? If the Navy required them, the Secretary of State should have laid in a stock. Charges of the same kind should not appear in different Estimates, and yet the charges in the Army Estimates for torpedoes were large in amount. The mistake was made in extending the liability of the War Office to supply the Navy with torpedoes, in addition to guns and ammunition. This new weapon of war should have been a special charge on the Navy and included in the Estimates of the Admiralty. The War Office would have continued the manufacture or purchase of these weapons if the Admiralty desired, but only as agents, and not with any degree of responsibility. The best plan would be to let the Admiralty manage for all material.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the Treasury practically regulated the mode in which the accounts were presented, and this item had had the assent of the Treasury. Representatives of the Admiralty witnessed the experiments at Spezia, and the Department thought it expedient to procure a supply of torpedoes from Italy instead of manufacturing them at Woolwich. The War Department would be glad to relieve their Estimates of these large sums.

CAPTAIN O'BEIRNE thought that to keep Cavalry waiting for orders while under long-range Infantry fire would have a demoralizing effect on them. He agreed with the opinion which had been expressed that the lance should be abolished.

MR. GOURLEY wished to know whether the torpedoes charged for were for the Navy or the Army Service, and as to the number of boats for transport.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, that the torpedoes were of a new kind, but it was not necessary to explain them. The boats were required for transporting stores; one had to be built to convey the 80-ton gun. He did not, however, know their number.

Sir Walter B. Barttelot.

MR. GOURLEY suggested that vessels should be borrowed from the Navy Department.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR thought that the War Office should have nothing to do with the ships of the Admiralty. That Board would charge more than anybody else, and supply the condemned and useless vessels of the Navy as quite good enough for the soldiers. The vessels sent out during the war with China would neither sink, sail, nor swim.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £828,700, Superintending Establishment of and Expenditure for Works, Buildings, and Repairs at Home and Abroad.

MR. J. R. YORKE said, he wished to ask one or two questions respecting the site of the Knightsbridge Barracks and the conditions on which it was proposed to re-erect them. It had always been understood that the ground occupied by the barracks was to be used for buildings. The road was to be widened, and then the architect would have to face the problem of erecting a proper barracks on an insufficient site. He could not think the present state of things satisfactory, and he had not approved the scheme from the outset; but he now acquiesced in it, thinking it better to spend £120,000 on new barracks than to waste £100,000 in vainly ornamenting the old building.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY replied that the architect had fully considered the widening of the road, and had made his plans accordingly. The shifting of the officers' quarters had become necessary. The riding school was to be brought to the men's quarters, which would be an improvement on the plan originally contemplated, and the officers' quarters would be shifted upwards; but would not be placed at the extreme west end of the barracks, where a lofty building would intercept the view from the houses in the Knightsbridge Road. As the Guards would still have in front of the barracks the ordinary green sward in which they had been accustomed to exercise, they did not require a large court-yard.

(8.) £31,000, Miscellaneous Effective Services.

MR. HAYTER said, that a new military attaché was appointed. Would the right hon. Gentleman inform him where he was to be sent?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: To Constantinople.

(9.) £249,100, Administration of the Army.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR complained of the obscure manner in which the military accounts were kept, so that it was impossible to ascertain what the expenses of the Indian Army were as compared with that at home. For the first time they had large sums deducted from the Estimates of the Home Army, because India employed officers and men belonging to that Home Army; but there was no information supplied to the House of Commons as to the numbers and grades so employed, excepting as regarded the regimental strengths. No doubt those numbers could be furnished; and as the details of the entire charge of £1,000,000, which the Estimates stated would be paid by India, could be supplied, he hoped that the Secretary of State for War would in future furnish the information, not only for the present year, but for previous as well as for future years as they come on. This charge of £1,000,000 was indeed heavy, considering that the pay of the regimental men and officers was borne by the Indian Estimates and not shown in the Home Estimates.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN called attention to the establishment of a Staff College and a Staff Corps some 10 or 12 years ago, and he wished to know if the right hon. Gentleman would consent to a continuance of the Returns he had obtained for the last five years, showing the appointments made and the names of the officers appointed?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he had no objection whatever to the Returns being continued.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) £33,500, Rewards for Distinguished Services, agreed to.

(11.) £53,600, Pay of General Officers.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he considered they were entitled on this Vote to raise questions relating to the mode in which the military administration of India and the Home Government was carried on. They were entitled to raise the question as to how officers were appointed to the Staff in India, and how the influence of the Commander-in-Chief had been able to carry out certain military changes.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY thought the observations of the hon. Baronet were not relevant to the question before the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the hon. Baronet was not in Order.

Vote agreed to.

In reply to Mr. CHILDERS,

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he hoped to be able before the end of the Session to bring forward the subject of the Royal Warrant with reference to retirement in the Army. He was not aware that any changes in it would render it necessary to propose a Vote. But if it were necessary, it would be brought forward independently of these Estimates. He would in that case make a statement on the subject, with the view of eliciting the opinion of the House; but he could not submit the Royal Warrant to the consideration of Parliament, because that would be an interference with the Royal Prerogative.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL observed that they had received a very clear statement of the conditions on which officers of the Navy were retired, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to tell them with equal clearness on what conditions the officers of the Army were to retire. Were they liable after retirement to be called out for public service?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the question of the liability of officers who had retired on full pay was a question of law. The officers of the Navy, on retirement, had always been informed that they were liable to be called upon; but the officers of the Army had not been so informed, and, therefore, he could not at once answer the question of the hon. Baronet as to their exact liability, which, he repeated, was a question of law.

Sir Patrick O'Brien

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT was anxious to know, not whether his right hon. Friend hoped to be able to bring forward a retirement scheme, but whether he positively intended to do so?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY thought his hon. and gallant Friend was a little too exacting. It was not in his power to say absolutely whether he could do so or not. He was obliged to have the assent of two parties, and if he did not get their assent he could not bring it forward. If he could find time, it was his full intention to do so; and it was the intention of the Government to give the opportunity, if he could get the Warrant.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he would support a liberal allowance for retiring officers provided they were ready to serve with the Auxiliary Forces; but he would oppose a large allowance if the officers would not remain available for the service of the country.

MR. WHALLEY called attention to the inadequacy of the pay of the skilled officers, and especially of medical men attached to the Militia and Reserve Forces. He suggested the employment of retired officers to promote the efficiency of the Volunteer Forces.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN warmly supported the suggestion of the hon. Member as well deserving the consideration of the Government, especially after the Report of General Stephenson that the Volunteers were inefficiently officered. He also urged that time would be saved if these Estimates as affecting India were settled by a joint Committee of the War Office and the India Office, so as to enable one Minister to give satisfactory explanations in Committee of Supply.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the question of utilizing retired officers had been raised by the recent Commission on Retirement and Promotion, and it would not be lost sight of. Indeed, the suggestion had been acted upon in officering the Reserves and the Militia; but it was more difficult to adopt it in the case of the Volunteers, with their local associations and their desire to select their own officers. Still, many retired officers had accepted commands and commissions in the Volunteer Forces.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked for some assurance that something would be done towards making officers who retired under the Retirement Scheme liable for service if called upon.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that perhaps in a fortnight he would be able to give a better answer. With regard to the past, if officers were not at present liable, he could not make them liable; but the question as to the conditions of retirement in the future was different.

Vote agreed to.

(14.) £16,700, Pensions for Wounds.

(15.) £35,000, Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals (In-Pensions).

In reply to Mr. WHALLEY,

MR. GATHORNE HARDY stated that it was hoped what might be saved in expenditure upon small and inefficient regiments of Yeomanry would, when expended upon larger and more efficient ones, be productive of great benefit to the latter. This proposal was in accordance with the recommendation contained in the Report of the Yeomanry Committee.

Vote agreed to.

(19.) £1,000,000, Regular Forces in India.

(Mr. Raikes, Lord George Hamilton, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. FAWCETT said, the Bill contemplated two entirely distinct objects. First, it empowered the Government of India to raise £2,500,000 by the issue of bills for a limited period, to serve as a fund which would make it unnecessary for the Government at unfavourable times to go into the Money Market. The second object was that £2,500,000 should be raised in this country to meet a deficit in the present year's revenue, and that that sum should be added to the permanent debt of India. Confining his attention for the moment to the power given by the Bill to raise £2,500,000 simply for the purpose of giving the Government the command of a balance which would enable them at particular periods to go into the market or not as they thought fit, he wished to observe that that was a proposal which had been recommended to the House on the plea that it had had the support of Mr. Bagehot. Now, he had read every word, he believed, which had been written by Mr. Bagehot, and, having had the privilege of enjoying his most intimate friendship, had discussed over and over again with him the subject of Indian finance; and he ventured to say that if his works were searched from beginning to end, not a single argument would be found in them to support the proposal now before the House. For years Mr. Bagehot had been the distinguished editor and chief contributor to one of the leading financial journals, not only in this country, but in Europe; and immediately after the Under Secretary of State for India had stated that he based his proposal on his authority, The Economist said that there was a most material difference between that proposal and what Mr. Bagehot had always recommended. Mr. Bagehot's advice was that if it was necessary for the Indian Government again to come to England to borrow, they should not add to the permanent debt of India, but should obtain the money they required by the issue of a certain amount of bills or temporary securities, and then if they found that the price of silver was likely to settle down, these temporary securities could, in a year or two's time, be withdrawn. That recommendation, whether deserving support or not, was obviously distinct from the proposals of the Bill before the House. Considering the great practical importance of the subject, he hoped that between the second reading and the time for Committee there would be a sufficient interval to admit of the question being fully considered by the mercantile community, who had direct dealings with India. The Government wanted to raise, in order to meet a deficit, £2,500,000 in this country, and, flying straight in the face of Mr. Bagehot's advice, they were about to add that amount to the permanent debt of India. They then hit on the novel expedient of issuing a certain amount of bills whereby they could enter the Money Market as speculators in silver; but he had been assured only the day before by a mercantile man of experience and eminence that that was a course of proceeding which involved very serious considerations, and to the full importance of which those engaged in business in connection with the East were not fully alive. It was said, however, that it was necessary the Government should have the power of which he was speaking to protect themselves against combinations of those who intended to purchase their council bonds, and who by forming a ring might compel them to sell at less than the market value. That fear of combinations, however, was, he was assured by some leading bankers and merchants, an entire delusion; but, of course, if it could be shown that the Government would have to contend against a ring of that kind, it might be necessary to arm them with power to resist it. With respect to the second part of the Bill, it was proposed, in the first place, to borrow in this country £2,500,000 to enable the Government to enter into those speculations to which he had alluded, and to increase the permanent debt by £2,500,000 more by loan from the same source. At present the revenue of India was only about £40,000,000, which was inadequate for the ordinary expenditure; but notwithstanding that fact, and notwithstanding that the present was a time of profound peace, they proposed to borrow on the whole £8,500,000, being 20 per cent of the whole revenue. It might be said that the borrowing of this large sum was necessitated by the famine. The famine charge was put down at £2,000,000, and leaving this out of consideration for the moment, he would say the Government were going this year to take authority to raise £6,500,000. If the £2,500,000 of which he had spoken was placed in the hands of the Government, what security had we that it would not be devoted to purposes of ordinary income? He had the more reason to think this would be done, because the Under Secretary did not say a word the other day about the extraordinarily low figure to which the cash balances had been reduced. Some years ago they amounted to £24,000,000; they had now been reduced to £12,000,000, so that no less than £12,000,000 had been spent. Lord Northbrook thought that the cash balances ought at least to be £1,000,000 more than they were at present, and they ought therefore to be replenished. Three years ago, when the noble Lord came into office as the Under Secretary of State for India, he gave three distinct promises with regard to the future finance of India. At the time those promises appeared to him (Mr. Fawcett) to be distinct and satisfactory. In 1874 the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton) said that Lord Salisbury had determined that no work should be undertaken which did not produce a fair return; that no work should be undertaken even of a reproductive character which involved the raising of capital in this country; and that every effort should be made to keep the ordinary expenditure within the ordinary revenue. He regretted that those promises had not been fulfilled. The second part of the Bill added £2,500,000 to the permanent debt. This was a policy fraught with the utmost peril. At the present moment the home charges were no less than £16,000,000, while, a few years ago, they were only between £9,000,000 and £10,000,000. He had given Notice of an Amendment—namely,

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient to raise by loan in this Country, on the security of the revenues of India, so large a sum as is provided for by this Bill.”
